Persons who are employed as seamen are exempted from the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act as to minimum wages and overtime pay, and for the purpose of applying the exemption the term "seaman" must be taken in its ordinary meaning.

Under the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, § 13 (a) (3), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (a) (3), the requirements of the statute with respect to minimum wages and overtime pay do not apply to any person who is employed as a seaman.[29] It has been held that the exemption must be strictly construed to effectuate the remedial purpose of congress in adopting the act[30] and that the term "seaman" is to be construed in accordance with the intent of the Fair Labor Standards Act, rather than in accordance with the meaning attributed to the term in other statutes.[31] Accordingly the term is not to be given the same broad inclusive meaning as is given to it in statutes passed for the benefit of seamen.[32]

For the purpose of applying the statutory exemption, the term "seaman" must be taken in its ordinary meaning,[33] and generally refers to an employee

Other exemption

The provision of Fair Labor Standards Act, exempting switchboard operators in public telephone exchanges having less than five hundred stations from application of minimum and overtime wage provisions, negatives congress' intent to include public telephone exchanges in term "retail or service establishment," as used in provision exempting employees in such establishments.—Strand v. Origin of exemption

Pursuant to requests made by various maritime unions, the exemption was written into the act primarily to avoid conflict between the jurisdiction over seamen already conferred on the maritime commission with respect to wages, working conditions, and manning scales on subsidized merchant ships, 46 U.S.C.A. § 1131 (a), and that of the newly established wage and hour administration.—Anderson v. who performs, as master or subject to the control of the master aboard a vessel, services rendered primarily as an aid in the operation of the vessel as a means of transportation,[34] or who performs duties of a maritime character on a vessel in navigable waters.[35] Accordingly whether a worker is a seaman, as the term is commonly used, depends on the character of his duties as maritime or otherwise,[36] and the mere fact that of necessity the work that an employee does is performed on navigable waters is alone not sufficient to remove him from the coverage of the statute.[37] Where an employee does some nautical work, but such work is merely incidental and occasional, and the dominant employment is work of another kind, the exemption does not apply.[38]

It has been held that the statutory exemption of seamen extends to employees on tug boats, performing commercial tug service for river boats and barge fleets moving in interstate commerce,[39] to employees on barges, whose work is necessary for their operation, welfare, and safety, notwithstanding the barges lack motive power or steering gear,[40] and to deck hands on dredges who aid in the navigation thereof.[41] It has been held, on the other hand, that the exemption does not extend to barge hands who do a substantial amount of nonexempt work[42] or to dredge workers whose work is essentially con-

Duties

Barge tenders, who were employed on pulpwood barges which were operated on inland waterways and were towed by tugs, and whose duties required them to see that barges were loaded evenly and not too near the edge, and to keep barges clean and to watch out for fire and to pump the bilge water when necessary, and to help in putting out the anchor and in tying the boat moorings, and who had no duty in connection with navigation but were subject to orders of captain of tug when in tow, were seamen so as to be exempt from minimum wage and maximum hour provisions of act.—Lowrimoore v. Employment by day

Fact that deck hand on a dredge was employed by day and for the most part ate and slept ashore did not necessarily prevent him from being a seaman and member of a crew, so as to be exempt.—Bolan v. Bay State Dredging & Contracting Co., supra.

Ratio of nautical to longshore duties

"Substantial," as used in wage and hour administrator's interpretive bulletin excluding from wage and hour provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act barge tenders on nonself-propelled barges who do a substantial amount of nonexempt work, such as loading and unloading and activities relative thereto, denotes a comparison based on a ratio of nautical to longshore duties.—Anderson v. Manhattan Lighterage Corp., C.C.A.N.Y., 148 F.2d 971, certiorari denied Manhattan Lighterage Corp. v. Andersen, 66 S.Ct. 27, 326 U.S. 722, 90 L.Ed. 428.

Handling of cargo

(1) Employee on a barge who spent by far the greater part of his time in supervising, checking, and facilitating loading or unloading of cargo, and not merely caring for his barge and attending to her moorings was a "harbor worker" and not a "seaman" exempt from provisions of act.—McCarthy v. Wright & Cobb Lighterage Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 163 F.2d 92.

(2) Bargee who was employed on a lighter without means of self-propulsion and who spent most of his time in stevedoring work in connection with loading and discharging cargo was within the coverage of act

nected with excavation and not with navigation.[43] A person who worked on steamships during the fit-out and sailing seasons, and until the end of lay-up periods, and who worked, ate, and slept aboard ships during that time, has been held a seaman during the entire period of his employment.[44]

§ 151(16). —— Employees Engaged in Catching, Taking, or Harvesting of Aquatic Forms of Animal and Vegetable Life

Employees engaged in the catching, taking, or harvesting of fish or other aquatic forms of animal and vegetable life are exempted from the requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act as to minimum wages and overtime pay.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 13 (a) (5), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (a) (5), exempts from its requirements as to minimum wages and overtime pay employees employed in the catching, taking, harvesting, cultivating, or farming of any kind of fish, shellfish, crustacea, sponges, seaweeds, or other forms of animal and vegetable life, including the going to and returning from work,[45] and including employment in the loading, unloading, or packing of such products for shipment or in propagating, processing, marketing, freezing, canning, curing, storing, or distributing the above products or byproducts thereof.[46] The manifest purpose of the exemption was to except such activities or operations connected with the maritime pursuits described as were controlled or materially influenced by natural factors or elements,[47] and in accordance with the general rule as to construction of exemptions from the statute, discussed supra § 151 (11), it has been held that the exemption must be strictly construed.[48]

The term "processing" in the exemption provision must be construed in accordance with the context and the legislative intent,[49] and refers to the immediate operations on shore which are necessary to make the catch or take marketable and not manufacturing operations having no immediate or necessary relationship in time to the catch or take, such as the making of buttons from shells.[50]

§ 151(17). —— Employees Engaged in Agriculture

The Fair Labor Standards Act exempts persons employed in agriculture from its provisions as to minimum wages and overtime pay, and the term "agriculture" is defined as farming in all its branches.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 13 (a) (6), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (a) (6), expressly excludes from its requirements as to minimum wages and overtime pay any person employed in agriculture.[51] Such and not a "seaman."—Knudsen v. Lee & Simmons, Inc., C.C.A.N.Y., 163 F.2d 95.

Mooring intervals

If employees hired for first time during mooring intervals to repair vessel signed articles as seamen and continued to work on vessel in ensuing navigation period, they would be "seamen" exempt from benefits of Fair Labor Standards Act, but, if they did not sign articles and were employed only during the mooring interval, the exemption clause would not be applicable.—Walling v. Keansburg Steamboat Co., C.C.A.N.J., 162 F.2d 405.

Dredging of shells

W. D. Haden Co., C.C.A.Tex., 153 F.2d 196, certiorari denied W. D. Haden Co. v. Walling, 66 S.Ct. 1373, 328 U.S. 866, 90 L.Ed. 1636.

46. U.S.—Fleming v. Hawkeye Pearl Button Co., C.C.A.Iowa, 113 F.2d 52.

Held within exemption

(1) Plaintiffs who were employed at night by seafood packing and processing plant to raise steam on boilers with which to cure shrimp and oysters and to notify other employees at the proper hour by blowing a whistle and to cool off and wash out the boilers when plaintiffs came on duty and to mix brine for the next processing.—Waller v. Humphreys, C.C.A.Miss., 133 F.2d 193.

(2) Employee, engaged in driving truck in interstate and intra-state commerce, for purpose of loading, unloading, and delivering fish and sea food and also in handling, making ready, and preparing for shipment the sea food handled by employer and sold by it to wholesale and retail dealers.—Johnson v. Johnson & Co., D.C.Ga., 47 F.Supp. 650.

Exemption held not applicable

(1) Generally.—Walling v. Public Quick Freezing & Cold Storage Co., D.C.Fla., 62 F.Supp. 924.

(2) Employer engaged in manufacture and sale of boxes and barrels used for shipment of crabmeat and oysters in interstate commerce was not engaged in catching, taking, harvesting, etc., of fish, sponges, or other forms of animal and vegetable life including loading and packing of such products for shipment.—Dize v. Maddrix, C.C.A.Md., 144 F.2d 584, affirmed 65 S.Ct. 895, 324 U.S. 697, 89 L.Ed. 1296.

exemption must be strictly construed in order to carry out the remedial purpose of the statute,[52] but it also must be given due effect in the case of employments within its terms.[53]

The term "agriculture" as used in the exemption provision is defined in another provision of the act, § 3(f), 29 U.S.C.A. § 203 (f), as meaning farming in all its branches,[54] including, among other things, the cultivation and tillage of the soil, dairying, the production, cultivation, growing, and harvesting of any agricultural or horticultural commodities,[55] the raising of livestock, bees, fur-bearing animals, or poultry,[56] and any practices, including any forestry or lumbering operations, performed by a farmer or on a farm as an incident to, or in conjunction with, such farming operations, including preparation for market, delivery to storage or to market or to carriers for transportation to market.[57] The word "agriculture" as so defined was intended to cover much more than what might be called ordinary farming activity,[58] and the scope of such definition may not be narrowed by applying different definitions of the word contained in other statutes.[59] However, the broad statutory definition should not be extended by construction to exempt laborers from the provisions of the act unless they are in fact employed in agriculture.[60]

An operation to be exempt from the application

Reason for exemption

(1) The manifest reason underlying the exemption is a recognition of the seasonal nature of the occupation.—Dye v. McIntyre Floral Co., 144 S.W.2d 752, 176 Tenn. 527.

(2) The exemption was adopted because agricultural labor was not subject to the usual evils of sweatshop conditions and long hours indoors at low wages and any attempt to regulate such wages would present a difficult problem in view of the fact that a substantial part of a farm laborer's income is for board and room.—Bowie v. Gonzalez, C.C.A. Puerto Rico, 117 F.2d 11—Jordan v. Stark Bros. Nurseries & Orchards Co., D.C.Ark., 45 F.Supp. 769.

Harvesting

(1) An interpretative bulletin promulgated by the administrator of the wage and hour division defining "harvesting" to include all operations customarily performed in connection with removal of crops by farmers from their growing position in the field is of some evidentiary value in determining whether sugar cane workers were exempt from act as agricultural workers.—Vives v. Serralles, supra.

(2) Employees who worked on sugar farms other than the one on which employer's sugar mill was located, who were engaged in laying portable tracks and moving them from one field to another, loading steel cars, portable track cars or oxcarts in the field, picking up cane dumped by ox-carts and loading railroad cars at the sidings, etc., were not engaged in transportation but were engaged in "harvesting" and were agricultural laborers exempt from operation of act.—Vives v. Serralles, supra.

Production

(1) The word "production" used in provision defining the term "agriculture" refers to that which is derived and produced from the soil, such as any farm produce.—Bowie v. Gonzalez, C.C.A.Puerto Rico, 117 F.2d 11.

(2) The grinding and processing operation through which sugar cane goes and which results in the production of raw sugar, are the processing of agricultural products and not the production of them, and hence employees engaged in sugar mills and transportation facilities were not excluded from the benefits of the act. —Bowie v. Gonzalez, supra.

(3) An employee who fired boilers which supplied heat for greenhouses and for sterilization of soil in which plants were grown indoors from seedlings by wholesale florist producing cut flowers from such plants, was engaged in production of horticultural commodity and hence was agricultural employee.—Damutz v. William Pinchbeck, Inc., C.C.A.Conn., 158 F.2d 882.

of the statute under the definition of "agriculture" contained therein must be a farming operation or incident to farming,[61] and what is incident to farming must be determined on the basis of all pertinent facts, keeping in mind the purpose of the act and the circumscribed nature of exemptions.[62] The mere fact that owners of farms are also owners of mill and transportation facilities does not make transportation an incident to farming within the exemption of the statute,[63] and, where the employees engaged in transportation of agricultural products and in the repair and maintenance of transportation facilities are employed by the mill and do no agricultural work, the transportation is incidental to the milling, and not incidental to farming, so as to subject such employees to the operation of the statute.[64] Where an employer's business regularly involves the handling of commodities grown by others, those activities are not a practice incidental to farming, even though the handling and processing of his own grown commodities would be incidental to his farming operations.[65] It has been held, however, that if the employer is primarily engaged in handling commodities grown by himself, the exemption may apply although a negligible portion of his business involves commodities grown by others.[66]

The employees of a nursery or greenhouse which grows plants, flowers, and trees, prepares them for market, and sells them have been held exempt as engaged in agriculture,[67] but employees engaged in the storing, wrapping, and shipping of finished nursery stock purchased by the employer from other establishments have been held not exempt,[68] although there is some authority apparently to the contrary.[69] Where an employer operating a greenhouse handles some products not grown by himself, but such outside purchases are merely incidental to the main business and constitute but a small per cent of the total, his employees are exempt from the act.[70]

§ 151(18). —— Employees of Electric Railways or Local Trolley or Motorbus Carriers

Employees of electric railways or local trolley or motorbus carriers are exempted from requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act as to minimum wages and overtime pay.

Under a provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act § 13 (a) (9), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (a) (9), the requirements of the statute with respect to minimum wages and overtime pay do not apply to employees of a street, suburban, or interurban electric railway, or local trolley or motorbus carrier.[71] Such exemption must be strictly construed to carry out the purposes and intent of the statute.[72] The term "local carrier" does not refer to one whose operations are solely intra-state,[73] and the word "local" as used in the statute is not confined in its geographical aspect to operations adjacent to or within a commercial zone, but is used with reference to operations in commerce.[74]

It has been held that the exemption extends to employees of a local carrier engaged in producing electricity solely for operation of the local transportation system,[75] but where a substantial portion of the electricity is produced for other purposes the employees are not exempt,[76] since the exemption may not be extended to an otherwise nonexempt business in which the employer regularly and substantially engages merely because the employer's principal business is exempt.[77]

Exemption of employees of motor carriers subject to regulations of Interstate Commerce Commission is discussed infra § 151 (20).

§ 151(19). —— Employees Engaged in Processing Agricultural Products

a. Exemption from all requirements of act
b. Exemption from overtime provisions

a. Exemption from All Requirements of Act

An exemption from the requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act as to minimum wages and overtime pay exists for persons employed within the area of production in the handling, packing, storing, or preparing in their raw or natural state of agricultural or horticultural commodities for market; and the application of the exemption depends solely on the character of the services of the particular employee, and on the location or place of employment with relation to the area of production of the agricultural commodity.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 13 (a) (10), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (a) (10), exempts from its requirements as to minimum wages and overtime pay persons employed within the area of production, as defined by the administrator, engaged in the handling, packing, storing, ginning, compressing, pasteurizing, drying, preparing in their raw or natural state, or canning of agricultural or horticultural commodities for market, or in making cheese or butter or other dairy products.[78] The exemption creates an exception to the general scope of the act and is subject to strict construction,[79] but in cases in which it is applicable it must be given effect.[80] The application of the exemption depends solely on the character of the services of the particular employee, and on the location or place of employment with relation to the area in which are produced the agricultural commodities on which the services of the employee are performed,[81] and the administrator is not authorized to make any definition or to prescribe any limitation on the operation of the exemption except to define "area of production."[82]

73. U.S.—Gillette v. Rockland Coaches, D.C.N.Y., 50 F.Supp. 617, affirmed, C.C.A., 142 F.2d 616.

"It seems to have been the intention to extend the exemption to all carriers who do a local business regardless of the fact that such business might extend into different cities and states. The growth of communities is controlled by geographic and economic influences and frequently overruns arbitrary municipal and state boundaries. It seems that the Fair Labor Standards Act recognized this fact and excluded from its provisions such operations as are local to any community."—Valley Motor Transit Co. v. Conley, D.C.Ohio, 49 F.Supp. 751, affirmed, C.C.A., Conley v. Valley Motor Transit Co., 139 F.2d 692.

Held "local" carriers

(1) A transit company which operated buses between municipalities in Rockland county, N. Y., Bergen county, N. Rockland Coaches, D.C.N.Y., 50 F.Supp. 617, affirmed, C.C.A., 142 F.2d 616.

(2) A transit company which operated busses between Steubenville, Ohio, and Beaver, Pennsylvania, and furnished transportation mainly to workers, school children, shoppers, and commuters, and which charged its fares according to zones rather than by mileage and maintained a service which was local in character as indicated by number of stops for taking on and discharging passengers.—Valley Motor Transit Co. v. In order to come within the exemption, the employee must be engaged in work of the kind specified in the statute,[83] involving agricultural or horticultural commodities in their primitive state,[84] and the exemption does not apply to labor employed in the process of transformation from the primitive product to an artificial product, the raw and natural character having been eliminated.[85]

Area of production. In order to come within the exemption provided by the statute, the employment must exist within the area of production of the commodity as fixed by a valid regulation of the administrator,[86] and it has been held that the area of production may vary according to the particular commodity and the particular section of the country.[87] The statute casts on the administrator the authority and duty to define the term "area of production" of agricultural commodities with reference to which the exemption in subsidiary employments may operate,[88] and to the extent that his regulations proper-

Work held of exempt nature

(1) Employer engaged in business of crushing and otherwise manipulating cotton seed for purpose of extracting cottonseed oil and producing cake meal.—Abram v. San Joaquin Cotton Oil Co., D.C.Cal., 46 F. Supp. 969.

(2) Grain elevator company which received, weighed, tested, graded, cleaned, stored, and loaded grain.—Holt v. Barnesville Farmers Elevator Co., C.C.A.Minn., 145 F.2d 250, certiorari denied 65 S.Ct. 857, 324 U.S. 858, 89 L.Ed. 1416—Remington v. Shaw, D.C.Mich., 52 F.Supp. 465.

(3) Nonprofit co-operative associations engaged in picking and packing citrus fruit.—Redlands Foothill Groves v. Jacobs, D.C.Cal., 30 F.Supp. 995.

(4) Shelling peanuts even though done by machinery and off the producing farm and by one not a farmer.—Fleming v. Farmers Peanut Co., C.C.A.Ga., 128 F.2d 404.

(5) Work in a gristmill.—Anderson v. Meacham, 8 S.E.2d 459, 62 Ga. App. 145.

Work held not of exempt nature

(1) Employer engaged in compressing but not in ginning cotton and an employee performing the duties of a general utility laborer were not exempt under provision exempting employees of an employer engaged in the ginning and compressing of cotton.—Silgaro v. Port Compress Co., D.C.Tex., 45 F.Supp. 88.

(2) Employee whose work consisted entirely of servicing equipment used in the transportation, distribution, and sale of ice cream after the processing had been completed was not engaged in handling, etc., agricultural commodities in their raw or natural state, nor was he engaged in the making of any dairy products within meaning of provision excluding from overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act individuals engaged in such work.—Colbeck v. Dairyland Creamery Co., S.D., 17 N.W.2d 262.

Additional duties

Where employees had duties in addition to "handling, packing, drying" agricultural commodities for market, they did not fall within provision exempting from minimum wage and overtime compensation provisions of act persons employed within area of production exclusively engaged in "handling, packing, drying" agricultural commodities for market.—Walling v. Peacock Corp., D.C.Wis., 58 F.Supp. 880.

84. U.S.—Abram v. San Joaquin Cotton Oil Co., D.C.Cal., 46 F.Supp. 969.

Activity classed as agricultural labor

In order to authorize the exemption, the preparation of commodity must bear such a proximity to its raw or natural state that the activity involved will be classified as agricultural labor within the contemplation of the act.—Abram v. San Joaquin Cotton Oil Co., supra.

The peanut is an agricultural commodity, both before and after process of shelling is performed, within meaning of provision of act.—Fleming v. Farmers Peanut Co., C.C.A.Ga., 128 F.2d 404.

Poultry

The handling of poultry for market is not included in the handling of agricultural commodities for market, within meaning of provision exempting the handling of agricultural commodities for market from the wage and hour provisions of the act.—Stratton v. Farmers Produce Co., C.C.A.Ark., 134 F.2d 825.

Exemption held not applicable

(1) Sugar producers' employees who were employed in mills and transportation service of the producers were not exempt, since processing of sugar is not expressly mentioned in the statute and production of raw sugar is not the preparation of an agricultural commodity in its raw or natural state.—Bowie v. Gonzalez, C.C.A.Puerto Rico, 117 F.2d 11.

(2) Exemption was intended to apply only to such activities as washing and grading agricultural products after full growth had been attained and did not exempt from the act one engaged in furnishing heat to commercial greenhouses, apparently including the packing room.—Damutz v. Wm. Pinchbeck, Inc., D.C. Conn., 66 F.2d 667, affirmed, C.C.A., 158 F.2d 882.

85. U.S.—Abram v. San Joaquin Cotton Oil Co., D.C.Cal., 46 F.Supp. 969.

Manipulating flax seed

The exemption did not apply to employer's business of crushing and otherwise manipulating flax seed and other oil producing vegetable commodity for purpose of extracting merchantable oil and producing cake meal.—Abram v. Geographic lines

Under Fair Labor Standards Act § 13 (a) (10), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (a) (10), exempting from wage and hour provisions employees, within area of production as defined by Administrator, engaged in canning of agricultural commodities for market, congress restricted administrator to drawing of geographic lines, even though he may take into account all relevant economic factors in choice

ly delimit the area in accordance with the intent of the statute they are valid;[89] but they are invalid where they go beyond the intent of the statute,[90] as where they are not based solely on a reasonable geographical limitation, but introduce a limitation based on the number of employees within a defined area[91] or on the population of the place where the establishment is located.[92]

Where the administrator's regulation defining the term "area of production" is invalid, the court should not itself define the term but should await the promulgation of a valid definition,[93] but it has been held that the failure of the administrator to define the area of production as applied to a particular employer's business will not deprive that employer of the right, if any, to exemption, and that the courts will make the definition.[94]

b. Exemption from Overtime Provisions

The Fair Labor Standards Act exempts from its provisions as to overtime pay, either completely or for a specified period of time, employees engaged in the processing of specified agricultural and dairy products; but only the specific processes mentioned are exempt, and the employees must be exclusively engaged in work of the kind specified.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 7 (c), 29 U.S.C.A. § 207 (c), provides for exemption from its provisions as to overtime pay, either completely or for a specified period of time, employees of an employer engaged in the processing of specified agricultural and dairy products[95] in any place of employment

Boundaries

It has been held that the authority of the administrator to "define" an area of production does not presuppose that boundaries already exist and that the administrator must merely find them.—Redlands Foothill Groves v. Jacobs, D.C.Cal., 30 F.Supp. 995.

Changed conditions

Fact that congress empowered the administrator to define the area of production indicates that it was believed that changed conditions might bring about changes in definition and that definition might vary in different localities.—Silgaro v. Port Compress Co., D.C.Tex., 45 F.Supp. 88.

Regulations construed

(1) With respect to commodities to which applicable.—Fleming v. Farmers Peanut Co., D.C.Ga., 37 F.Supp. 628, affirmed, C.C.A., 128 F.2d 404.

(3) Where the regulation requires that, in order to be within the area of production, the products used by the establishment must be obtained within an area of ten miles, all of the products must be so obtained and not merely a substantial part thereof.—Addison v. Holly Hill Fruit Products, Fla., 64 S.Ct. 1215, 322 U.S. 607, 88 L.Ed. 1488, 153 A.L.R. 1007, rehearing denied 65 S.Ct. 27, 323 U.S. 809, 89 L.Ed. 645.

(4) In determining whether employees performed duties exempting them from protection of act within area of production, as defined by administrator, each of administrator's successive definitions of such phrase should be applied only to portion of plaintiffs' employment period during which it was operative, not to entire period.—Holt v. Barnesville Farmers Elevator Co., D.C.Minn., 52 F.Supp. 468, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., 145 F.2d 250, certiorari denied 65 S.Ct. 857, 324 U.S. 858, 89 L.Ed. 1416.

Void in entirety

Administrator's regulations providing that an individual is employed within area of production exempt from wage and hour provisions of Fair Labor Standards Act if establishment obtains commodities from the immediate locality, or from the general vicinity, and if number of employees in establishment does not exceed seven, are void in their entirety because of invalid limitation as to number of employees within a defined area, since court could not assume that administrator would have defined "area of production" merely by deleting the employee provision, had he known of its invalidity.—Addison v. Holly Hill Fruit Products, Fla., 64 S.Ct. 1215, 322 U.S. 607, 88 L.Ed. 1488, 153 A.L.R. 1007, rehearing denied 65 S.Ct. 27, 323 U.S. 809, 89 L.Ed. 645—Fleming v. Purpose of exemption

(1) Purpose of provision was to where they are so engaged.[96] It has been held that such provision does not exempt industries as a whole from the overtime provisions of the act but only the specific processes therein mentioned.[97] The exemption applies only to employees exclusively engaged in work of the kind specified,[98] and the exemption provision is inapplicable if the employee during any part of the work week for which exemption is claimed does any work which does not fall within the scope of the exemption.[99]

The statute does not limit the period of exemption from overtime provisions in the case of employers engaged in the processing of certain specified commodities.[1] However, the exemption from the provisions as to overtime applies only during a period of not more than fourteen work weeks in the aggregate in any calendar year in the case of an employer engaged in the first processing of, or in canning or packing, perishable or seasonal fruits or vegetables,[2] or in the first processing, within the area of production, of any agricultural or horticultural commodity during seasonal operations,[3] or in handling, slaughtering, or dressing poultry or livestock.[4] The employer may elect to take the benefit of the exemption during any work weeks, whether or not consecutive, if they do not exceed fourteen relieve processors of seasonal agricultural commodities from the hour provisions of the act so as to enable them more easily to conduct their operations during peak seasons.—Abram v. San Joaquin Cotton Oil Co., supra.

(2) Purpose of exemption to employers engaged in handling, slaughtering, or dressing live stock was to enable employers to avoid burden of time and a half for overtime in those seasonal or peak periods when they must work to take care of the product on market, the amount of which depends on factors beyond their control.—Walling v. Swift & Co., C.C.A. Ill., 131 F.2d 249.

Tobacco

Functional limitation
The words "handling" "slaughtering," and "dressing" are a functional limitation on classes of employees for whom an exemption from overtime provisions may be claimed by an employer, and only those employees of a packing plant working in certain departments are exempt; effect will be given to the trade usage of quoted language, and the exemption will be restricted to activities embraced by such trade usage.—Fleming v. Swift & Co., D.C.Ill., 41 F.Supp. 825, affirmed, C.C.A., Walling v. Swift & Co., 131 F.2d 249.

What constitutes exempt work
(1) Within poultry and livestock exemption, "handling" refers to those operations that start when the plant takes possession of the live poultry and includes all the operations down to the slaughtering of the poultry; "slaughtering" constitutes the whole killing operations and ends when the animal life is extinct; "dressing" refers to the freeing of the body from feathers and matter not suitable for consumption, the evisceration of the carcass, and all operations performed upon the carcass after slaughtering and until it goes to the coolers; employees whose work was connected with poultry dressed prior to receipt were not exempted.—Shain v. Armour & Co., D.C.Ky., 50 F.Supp. 907.

work weeks in the aggregate,[5] and the exemption may be claimed at different times as to each of the employees.[6]

In order to render the exemption applicable, the employer must be engaged in the processing, or first processing, of the specified commodities,[7] and the exemption may be claimed only during the season when processing or first processing is carried on.[8] The term "first processing" means that processing which first results in a marketable product,[9] and, where operations constitute a continuous processing that may not be halted at any point prior to completion, all of such operations may be considered first processing.[10] It has been held that the exemption is applicable not only to employees actually engaged in first processing operations, but to those whose work is incidental and necessary thereto,[11] but an employee whose work consists entirely of servicing equipment used in the transportation, distribution, and sale of the product after the processing has been completed has been held not within the exemption.[12]

Exemption of employees in industries of a seasonal nature is discussed infra § 151 (21).

§ 151(20). —— Employees or Employers Subject to Provisions of Interstate Commerce Act

a. In general
b. Employees of motor carriers

a. In General

Employees of an employer subject to the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act are exempted from the overtime pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 13 (b) (2), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (b) (2), exempts from its requirements as to overtime pay any employee of an employer subject to the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act §§ 1-27, 49 U.S.C.A. §§ 1-27,[13] and such exemption may apply notwithstanding the em-

7. U.S.—Abram v. San Joaquin Cotton Oil Co., D.C.Cal., 49 F. Supp. 393.

Transportation or receipt

Employees, engaged in transporting cream to creamery or in receiving it, or in pasteurizing or churning cream, are exempt.—Shain v. Armour & Co., D.C.Ky., 50 F.Supp. 907.

Butter

Creamery employees exclusively engaged in first processing of cream into butter are exempt from overtime provisions of act, but employees who handle butter churned elsewhere are not.—Shain v. Armour & Co., supra.

Cottonseed

(1) The term "processing of cottonseed," as used in provision of act exempting employer from overtime provisions of act with reference to employees engaged in processing of cottonseed, refers only to that part of employer's business which has to do with preparation and manufacture of cottonseed for the market, commonly known as the "crushing season," and all necessary laborers, watchmen, and clerical help, etc., needed to effect it.—Heaburg v. Independent Oil Mill, D.C.Tenn., 46 F. Supp. 751.

(2) The sale of bagging and ties to ginners by an employer engaged in preparation and manufacture of cottonseed as a matter of accommodation was only a service which was incidental to that of processing of cottonseed, within exemption provision.—Heaburg v. Independent Oil Mill, supra.

Eggs

Candling, grading and packing of eggs did not constitute first processing of agricultural or horticultural commodities during seasonable operations within meaning of the act.—Walling v. De Soto Creamery & Produce Co., D.C.Minn., 51 F.Supp. 938.

8. U.S.—Heaburg v. Independent Oil Mill, D.C.Tenn., 46 F.Supp. 751.

Dormant season

Employees of cottonseed oil mill plant who were actively engaged in or about the plant during dormant season were not engaged in processing of cottonseed within exemption, and hence were entitled to benefit of overtime compensation provision of the act.—Abram v. San Joaquin Cotton Oil Co., D.C.Cal., 49 F.Supp. 393—Heaburg v. Independent Oil Mill, D.C.Tenn., 46 F.Supp. 751.

Distilling brandy from completely processed wine was not first processing of fresh fruit, but where brandy so distilled was used solely for fortifying wine, the operation was incidental and necessary to first processing so as to make exemption applicable.—Hendricks v. Di Giorgio Fruit Corporation, supra.

The entire manufacturing operation from milk to Cheddar cheese and from cream to bulk butter by creamery was the first processing of milk and cream, so that creamery employees engaged in manufacture of Cheddar cheese and butter were exempt as against contention that the first processing ended with "flash" pasteurization of the raw product.—Sugar Creek Creamery Co. v. Walker, 187 S.W.2d 178, 208 Ark. 639.

Joint employees

Employees of an unincorporated association organized by railroads to perform weighing and inspection services for railroads, which operated under direction of a managing committee of officers of member railroads, and which had its expenses defrayed by monthly assessments on member railroads on basis of services received, were joint employees of an employer subject to Interstate Commerce Act and therefore were exempt from Fair Labor Standards Act.—Walling v. Western Weighing & Inspection Bureau, C.C.A.Ill., 160 F.2d 47.

Barge captains of lighters employed in interstate commerce by common carrier operating by rail and water under common control and management were not entitled to benefits of Fair Labor Standards Act, since carrier came within provision excepting from the act carriers by rail or water which were under the ployee is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods necessary for commerce.[14] It has been held that the exemption depends on the nature of the employer's business and that the nature of the work done by the employees is immaterial,[15] but it has also been held that if employees are engaged in activities not subject to regulation under the Interstate Commerce Act they are not exempt from overtime requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act notwithstanding other activities of the employer are subject to regulation under the former statute.[16] The decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission recognizing personnel of an employer as employees of a railroad carrier is not decisive of the employees' status but its reasoning may be persuasive.[17] Similarly its determination that an employer is not entitled to the status of an interstate common carrier may be given effect.[18]

b. Employees of Motor Carriers

Employees of motor carriers with respect to whom the interstate commerce commission has power to establish qualifications and maximum hours of service pursuant to the Motor Carrier Act are exempted from requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act with respect to overtime pay but not from provisions with respect to payment of minimum wages.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 13 (b) (1), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (b) (1), exempts from the provisions of the act as to overtime pay employees with respect to whom the Interstate Commerce Commission has power to establish qualifications and maximum hours of service pursuant to the provisions of the Motor Carrier Act § 204, 49 U.S.C.A. § 304.[19]

(2) Where wholly-owned subsidiary of common carrier which was an exempt employer under the Fair Labor Standards Act was formed for purpose of obtaining a radio license and radio telegraph services performed by subsidiary were available to the public without discrimination, radio operators were entitled to overtime compensation as employees of nonexempt subsidiary although operators were subject to provisions of Carriers' Taxing Act, were eligible to privileges of Railroad Retirement Act, and were treated as employees of carrier, and over ninety-eight per cent of service rendered was for the carrier.—Wabash Radio Corp. v. Purpose of exemption

(1) "By exempting the drivers of motors from the maximum hour limitations of the Fair Labor Standards Act, Congress evidently relied upon the Motor Carrier provisions to work out satisfactory adjustments for employees charged with the safety of operations in a business requiring fluctuating hours of employment, without the burden of additional pay for overtime."—Southland Gasoline Co. v. Bayley, Ark., 63 S.Ct. 917, 919, 319 U.S. 44, 87 L.Ed. 1244.

(2) Purpose of exemption was to free operators of motor vehicles from regulation by two agencies of the hours of drivers.—Boutell v. Walling, C.C.A.Mich., 148 F.2d 329, affirmed 66 S.Ct. 631, 327 U.S. 463, 90 L.Ed. 786.

Construction

(1) The particular language of sections of the Fair Labor Standards Act and the Motor Carrier Act relating to regulation of qualifications and maximum hours of service of employees of interstate motor carriers should be construed in the light of the purposes which led to enactment of the entire legislation.—Southland Gasoline Co. v. Bayley, Ark. & Md., 63 S.Ct. 917, 319 U.S. 44, 87 L.Ed. 1244.

(2) The court should be careful in construing the provision not to restrict unduly any federal statute which gives the commission power to encompass the end of public safety.

The exemption is confined to requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act with respect to overtime pay and does not affect the operation of provisions as to minimum wages for regular time[20] and as to the keeping of records of hours worked.[21]

Whether employees are exempt from the overtime pay provisions depends on whether the Interstate Commerce Commission has the "power to establish" maximum hours of service for them under the Motor Carrier Act,[22] and, if such power exists, the employees may be exempt although the commission has not affirmatively exercised the power[23] or although it has made no finding of need for its exercise, required as a condition to regulation of employees of private carriers.[24] Whether the commission has jurisdiction to establish qualifications and maximum hours of service of certain employees is not to be measured by regulations of the administrator of the wages and hours division but involves an interpretation of the scope of the safety program of the interstate commerce commission as determined from regulations made by the commission.[25]

With respect to the exemption of employees subject to regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the power of the commission extends and is confined to employees of motor carriers engaged in the interstate transportation of passengers or goods,[26] and generally, where motor transportation is purely intra-state, originating and terminating in the same state, the commission is without jurisdiction and the employees engaged in the transportation are not exempt.[27] However, an employee may

(3) It has been held that any doubt whether an employee comes within Fair Labor Standards Act or Motor Carrier Act is generally resolved in favor of the former, unless it clearly appears that a substantial part of his time is within the Motor Carrier Act.—Creno v. Caruso Produce Co., 64 N.Y.S.2d 214.

Partial-duty employees

The wage and hour administrator has no jurisdiction to interpret the compulsory overtime compensation provision of Fair Labor Standards Act as including partial-duty drivers or partial-duty loaders of interstate motor carriers who spend greater part of their time during a work week on activities which do not affect safety of operation of motor carriers.—Levinson v. Spector Motor Service, supra.

Work as loader

The court in which action under the Fair Labor Standards Act for overtime compensation was brought by employees of interstate motor carrier would be required to determine whether activities of the employees consisted either wholly or in substantial part of work defined by the Interstate Commerce Commission as that of a loader and as affecting safety of motor vehicle operation in interstate commerce, so as to subject such employees to jurisdiction of the Commission under the Motor Carrier Act in matter of maximum hours of service.—Pyramid Motor Freight Corp. v. 27. U.S.—Earle v. Brink's Inc., D.C. N.Y., 54 F.Supp. 676.

Intention of consignor

Transportation of butter by motor carrier to distributing plant within state, where butter was graded and prepared for reshipment and there was no intention by original consignor, carrier or consignee to continue transportation beyond state line, was intra-state commerce and services rendered by employees of motor carrier were covered by wage provisions of Fair Labor Standards Act.—Dallum v. Farmers Co-op.

be subject to control of the commission and hence exempt from the overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act even though his work is performed solely within a single state, provided his work forms an integral part of a continuous process of interstate commerce.[28] The exemption does not extend to workers who are not themselves employees of a carrier, although their services may affect the safety of operations of a carrier,[29] or to employees of a contract mail carrier.[30]

Generally, with respect to the exemption of employees of motor carriers, the commission has jurisdiction over the hours of service of those employees only whose activities affect the safety of operation of the motor vehicles used in interstate transportation,[31] such as drivers, drivers' helpers, loaders, and mechanics who perform inspection and repair work on vehicles,[32] but not employees whose work has no direct connection with the safety of operations,[33] such as those engaged in unloading and working in the warehouse, or in construction rather than maintenance and repair.[34] The title of the employee is immaterial and his status is determined by the actual duties performed.[35]

Crossing state lines

(1) Motor vehicles operated by employees need not actually cross state lines in order to confer jurisdiction on Interstate Commerce Commission and exempt employees from overtime provisions of Fair Labor Standards Act, but it is necessary that the property transported in the trucks be interstate shipments.—Earle v. Brink's Inc., D.C.N.Y., 54 F.Supp. 676.

(2) Where intention of original shipper was to move goods across state line to definite interstate destinations movement of goods by motor carrier within one state to common carrier terminals in performance of such preconceived intention constituted shipment in interstate commerce which placed employees of motor carrier within jurisdiction of Interstate Commerce Commission thereby preventing application of Fair Labor Standards Act.—Dallum v. 35. U.S.—Porter v. Poindexter, C. C.A.Okl., 158 F.2d 759.

Generally the exemption of employees engaged in activities affecting the safety of operation of an interstate motor carrier may extend to an employee part of whose duties involve such work as well as to an employee who is engaged solely in such work.[36] So an employee may be exempt if the whole or a substantial part of his activities comes within a class of work defined by the commission as affecting the safety of operations,[37] but he is not exempt if none[38] or only a small part[39] of his activities comes within the commission's classification. In determining whether the work involving safety of operations is sufficient in amount to warrant the exemption, it has been held that the unit of time which is to be considered is the work week[40] and that the exemption operates on a week-to-week basis and not on an hourly or monthly basis.[41]

Exemption of employees of local carrier is discussed supra § 151 (18).

§ 151(21). —— Employees in Industries of a Seasonal Nature

Employees in an industry found by the administrator to be of a seasonal nature are exempted from the overtime pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act for a period or periods of not more than fourteen work weeks.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 7 (b) (3), 29 U.S.C.A. § 207 (b) (3), exempts from the requirement of overtime pay for a period or periods of not more than fourteen work weeks employees in an industry found by the administrator of the wages and hours division to be of a seasonal nature.[42] Where the administrator makes such a finding, the exemption is not restricted to the season of maximum operation, but may be taken at any time during the year,[43] and is applicable to all employees.[44]

Exemption of employees engaged in processing agricultural products from overtime provisions is discussed supra § 151 (19).

§ 151(22). —— Employees of Governmental Bodies

The governments of the United States, of the several states, and their subdivisions are not employers within the Fair Labor Standards Act and their employees are not subject to the requirements of the act.

The Fair Labor Standards Act §§ 1–19, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 201–219, is designed to deal with private business and industry and § 3 (d), 29 U.S.C.A. § 203 (d) expressly excludes from the definition of "employer" subject to the act the governments of the United States, of the several states, and their subdivisions.[45] Such exemption has been held to extend to a transportation system owned and operated by a municipality.[46] It has been held that employees of an independent contractor performing work for a governmental body are not government employees exempt from the act[47] notwithstanding the economic burden of the contractor's compliance with the Fair Labor Standards Act might be carried on to the governmental body employing him[48] and the government closely supervised the contractor's activities.[49] It has been held, on the other hand, that employees of a war plant operated by a private contractor under contract with the United States and producing goods only for the government are employees of the government with respect to application of the Fair Labor Standards Act.[50]

§ 151(23). —— Other Specific Exemptions

Persons employed pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement are exempt from overtime pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act under circumstances fixed by the statute. The act also provides for exemption of other specified employees.

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act § 7 (b) (1), 29 U.S.C.A. § 207 (b) (1), an employer may employ a person for a work week in excess of that specified by the act without paying the compensation for overtime prescribed therein if such employee is employed in pursuance of an agreement, made as a result of valid collective bargaining, which provides that no employee shall be employed more than one thousand hours during any period of twenty-six consecutive weeks, and if such employee receives compensation for employment in excess of twelve hours in any work day, or for employment in excess of fifty six hours in any work week, as the case may be, at a rate not less than one and one half times the regular rate at which he is employed.[51] Only contracts which conform to the legislative standard are sufficient to establish the exemption.[52]

Exemption of learners, apprentices, and handicapped persons by regulation of the administrator of the wage and hour division is discussed supra § 151 (10).

Employees of small weekly or semi-weekly newspapers. The Fair Labor Standards Act § 13 (a) (8), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (a) (8), exempts from its provisions as to minimum wages and overtime pay persons employed in connection with the publication of any weekly or semi-weekly newspaper with a circulation of less than three thousand, the major part of which circulation is within the county where printed and published.[53] A newspaper having a larger circulation than that specified is not exempt from the act notwithstanding it has only a small out-of-state circulation.[54] Employees may be exempt as National Terminals Corporation, supra.

"No exemption on the basis of volume of out-of-state circulation was written into the Act. Rather the exemption of the small weeklies or semi-weeklies seems to have been adopted on the assumption that without it a newspaper with a regular out-of-state circulation, no matter how small, would be under the Act. The choice Congress made was not the exemption of newspapers with small out-of-state circulations but the exemption of certain types employed "in connection with the publication" of a newspaper although the major part of the newspaper's income is from job printing at which the employees also work.[55]

Switchboard operators of small public telephone exchanges. The Fair Labor Standards Act § 13 (a) (11), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (a) (11), exempts from its requirements as to minimum pay and overtime wages switchboard operators employed in a public telephone exchange having less than five hundred stations.[56] The test of whether an employer operates a public exchange within the exemption is whether it serves the public within the area in which its facilities are located or whether the system is confined to privileged individuals.[57] An exchange maintained primarily for the convenience of a corporation engaged in a commercial venture and not organized to operate a public exchange is not entitled to exemption under this provision.[58]

Labor organization. The Fair Labor Standards Act § 3 (d), 29 U.S.C.A. § 203 (d), exempts from the provisions of the act any labor organization, other than when acting as an employer, or anyone acting in the capacity of officer or agent of such labor organization.[59] A labor organization acting as an employer is not excluded from the coverage of the act.[60]

Carriers by air subject to Railway Labor Act. The Fair Labor Standards Act § 13 (a) (4), 29 U.S.C.A. § 213 (a) (4), exempts from its provisions as to minimum wages and overtime pay any employee of a carrier by air subject to the provisions of title II of the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 181–188.[61] An activity is not exempt from the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act merely because some of the activities of the employer are subject to the Railway Labor Act unless the activity itself is subject to the latter act.[62] In determining whether employees are exempt, the test of the applicability of the Railway Labor Act to a labor relationship is the relation of the activity to transportation, not the relationship created by the bookkeeping, accounting, purchase, and employment policies of the employer.[63]

§ 151(24). Operation and Effect

The provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act are generally determinative of the rights and duties of employers and employees subject to the act, and the requirements of the act may not be avoided by any act or omission of the parties, or by any custom or contract inconsistent with the act.

The provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act § 1 et seq, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, are generally determinative of the rights and duties of employers and employees subject to the act, with respect to minimum wages and overtime pay,[64] and the burden of regulating the observance of the act is on the employer as well as the employee.[65] The requirements of the act are mandatory, regardless of whom they affect,[66] and the statutory obligation con-

As a rule, the provisions of the statute may not be avoided by any act or omission of the parties,[69] and employers and employees cannot by contract limit the scope and effect of the act[70] or defeat its manifest purpose.[71] Contracts in violation of the act are illegal and not binding on employees[72] and any custom inconsistent with the requirements of the act must yield.[73] In other words, any custom or contract falling short of the basic policy of the act cannot be utilized to deprive employees of their statutory rights.[74] An employer's liability under the statute is something more than a debt or liability to an individual.[75]

"Implied contract;" lien

Fact that Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, requiring payment of overtime to employees under certain circumstances, was in existence at time of execution of employment contract under which employees rendered services on oil and gas leasehold did not create an "implied contract" to pay overtime, within statute providing that one who, under express or implied contract, performs labor for owner of leasehold for oil and gas purposes shall have lien on the whole leasehold.—Pace v. Continuation of abuses

Objectives of agreement

ed by collective bargaining agreements.[77] Where a wage order is issued for a particular industry requiring the payment of certain minimum wages, it modifies previous contracts between employers and employees in that industry providing for payment of a smaller amount and all other contract provisions in conflict with the statute.[78]

The provisions of the act with respect to minimum wages and overtime pay may not be evaded by an agreement entered into by employees before or during their period of employment to work for less than the minimum wage or not to accept overtime compensation or to accept overtime compensation at rates lower than those prescribed by the act;[79] nor may the parties agree that the employee shall be paid for only a part of the hours which the employee is required to serve.[80] However, there is nothing in the act which requires employers to continue to employ or employees to continue to work except on terms mutually agreeable to both, and, provided the act is complied with, the employer and employee are free to make any terms as to wages they choose.[81] Contracts between employer and employees as to wages are not made illegal by the act except as the minimum wage or the maximum hours provisions thereof are violated,[82] and it has been held that conformity of compensation and simplicity of calculation are legitimate objectives of a collective labor agreement, and should not be stricken as artificially designed to defy the spirit of Fair Labor Standards Act while embracing its letter.—Addison v. Huron Stevedoring Corp., D.C.N.Y., 69 F.Supp. 956.

Estoppel

Employees' right to have compensation computed as provided in the act could not be waived by employees and was a right which employees could not be estopped to assert, notwithstanding employees through their union forced employer to adopt an illegal split day plan of computing wages.—Robertson v. Alaska Juneau Gold Min. Co., C.C.A. Cal., 157 F.2d 876.

Distinct agreements

Where managers frankly advised employees of their orders to dismiss workers who failed to sign agreements valid under the act and threatened them with dismissal if they refused to do so, signing of the contracts under such circumstances created a definite understanding and agreement as to the basis on which further relations would continue and the contracts were binding on employer and all employees who signed them.—Atlantic Co. v. Federal Cartridge Corp., D.C.Minn., 62 F.Supp. 775, affirmed, C.C.A., 156 F.2d 681.

gress in enacting the Fair Labor Standards Act did not intend to impose on the variety of employment situations a single, rigid form of wage agreement.[83] In determining whether there was a bona fide contract between employer and employee, it is proper to consider not only the written instrument, but also the construction placed thereon by the parties and the payment of wages made by the employer.[84]

Shipment or sale in commerce as violation of act. Under Fair Labor Standards Act § 15 (a) (1), 29 U.S.C.A. § 215 (a) (1), it is a violation of the act to ship, deliver, or sell in commerce, or to ship, deliver, or sell with knowledge that shipment or delivery or sale thereof in commerce is intended, goods produced by employees employed in violation of the minimum wage or maximum hours provisions of the act.[85]

When wages to be paid. Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, minimum wages and overtime compensation are to be paid promptly,[86] and, as a rule, an employer becomes liable under the act for any overtime compensation on the next regular pay day covering the period of employment during which the overtime was worked.[87] However, if the correct overtime compensation cannot be determined until some time after the regular pay period, the employer is not thereby excused from making the proper computation and payment, since it is only required that employees receive a fifty per cent premium for such work as soon as convenient or practicable under the circumstances.[88]

§ 151(25). —— Minimum Wages

The Fair Labor Standards Act requires payment of an hourly rate of pay at least equal to the minimum specified in the act or in a wage order of the administrator, and some state statutes similarly require the payment of wages at not less than the rate established by a wage order.

Under the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act § 8, 29 U.S.C.A. § 208, it is the declared objective of the act to reach, as rapidly as is economically feasible without substantially curtailing employment, the objective of a universal minimum wage of a specified amount per hour in each industry subject to the act.[89] Accordingly § 6 of the act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 206, establishes basic minimum statutory wages, to be stepped up during the seven years from October 23, 1938, the effective date of the section.[90] Limited flexibility was provided in accordance with the declared purpose to reach the specified level earlier if economically feasible by permitting the administrator to fix by statutory procedure a higher minimum rate on recommendation of industry committees.[91] Accordingly the scheme of the statute is a combination of "statutory" minimum wages fixed by § 6 of the act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 206, and what may be termed "committee" wages, fixed by order of the administrator on recommendation of industry committees, pursuant to § 8 of the act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 208. The former prevail in the absence of special administrative action; the latter prevail when such action has been taken to prescribe for a specific industry a higher level than the generally prevailing statutory floor.[92]

Formula not applied

Where wages received by employees, allegedly received under formula method for overtime announced by board of conciliation under arbitration agreement, squared only with the old rate, court was required to conclude that the formula was not applied, and employees were entitled to recover for overtime wages and liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act for such period as the formula was allegedly applied, without regard to question of validity of formula.—Watkins v. Hudson Coal Co., C.C.A.Pa., 151 F.2d 311, certiorari denied 66 S.Ct. 522, 327 U.S. 777, 90 L.Ed. 1005, rehearing denied 66 S.Ct. 701, 327 U.S. 816, 90 L.Ed. 1039.

In accordance with the foregoing provisions of the act, the hourly rate of pay of employees subject to the act must be at least equal to the minimum specified in the act or in a wage order of the administrator,[93] and payment of less than the specified minimum wage constitutes a violation of the act,[94] rendering the employer liable to civil and criminal penalties, as discussed infra § 151 (34). The unit of measurement of the statutory wage fixed by the Fair Labor Standards Act is the hour,[95] and, although the provisions of the act do not specifically provide for any other method of paying wages except by an hourly rate, pay by the week, to be reduced by some method to hourly rates, is also covered by the act.[96] So, where the quotient of the weekly wage divided by the number of hours worked during the week is below the statutory minimum, the employer must adopt the minimum in computing wages due to its employees.[97] The act takes as its standard a single work week consisting of seven consecutive days,[98] and a payment above the minimum wage in one week may not be credited against any deficit existing in another week.[99]

Adamson Act. The fact that the contract employing a trainman subsequent to the Adamson Act of 1916, 39 U.S.St. at L. p 721, failed to provide for certain pay or specify what should constitute a day's work does not prevent the employee from being within the statute unless it is impossible to apply the act.[1] The act does not require payment at the statutory rate where the employees are desirous of carrying out their agreement to accept less, and this is especially so where the carrier is in an insolvent condition.[2]

National Industrial Recovery Act. The National Industrial Recovery Act § 1 et seq, 15 U.S.C.A. § 701 et seq, authorized the fixing of minimum wages by the provisions of codes of fair competition established for particular industries.[3] It has been held that the act itself did not impose a liability on an employer, independent of a voluntary contract, should the employer fail to observe its provisions as to the scale of wages exacted under the act,[4] and that employees were not under obligation to accept the rates of pay ordained by the act, and were at liberty to bargain, individually or collectively for a higher rate of pay than that designated.[5] Where an employer conspired with employees to evade the minimum wages fixed by the National Recovery Act Codes, before they were declared unconstitutional, by taking receipts from them for full code wages while paying lower wages, it was held that the employees could not maintain an action to recover the difference.[6]

State statutes. A state statute providing for the adoption of a minimum wage scale in any "sweatshop occupation" requires the payment of wages to an employee at not less than the rate established in a minimum wage order.[7] Under a statute relating to codes of fair competition and trade practices, it has been held that the governor cannot fix wages generally, but only where it is established as a matter of fact to the governor's satisfaction that the fixing of wages has relation to the elimination of unfair trade practices and unfair methods of competition.[8]

a. In General

The Fair Labor Standards Act requires that employees who work longer than forty hours during any work week be compensated for hours worked in excess of forty at a rate not less than one and one half times the regular rate, regardless of what the rate of pay may be; there can be no averaging of hours over two or more weeks in computing the overtime, and amounts paid in excess of the overtime requirements in some weeks may not be applied as a credit against payments due in other weeks.

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act § 207 (a), 29 U.S.C.A. § 207 (a), it is provided that no employer shall, except as otherwise provided by the act, employ any of his employees who is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce for a work week longer than that prescribed, which work week is fixed at forty hours after the expiration of the second year from the date of the act, unless such employee receives compensation for his employment in excess of the hours specified at a rate not less than one and one half times the regular rate at which he is employed.[9] Employment for a work week longer than forty hours without compensating employees as required by this provision constitutes a violation of the act,[10] rendering the employer liable to civil and criminal penalties, as discussed infra § 151 (34). Payment for overtime in excess of a specified number of hours is also provided for by territorial statute,[11] but, as discussed infra § 155, it has been held that a state statute prohibiting employees of certain establishments from working more than a specified number of hours per week gives no civil remedy or private right of action for overtime services.

It has been held that the provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act regarding overtime compensation must be liberally construed.[12] The words of

Purpose

(1) Fair Labor Standards Act § 7 (a), by increasing employer's labor costs by fifty per cent at end of the forty-hour week and by giving employees a fifty per cent premium for all excess hours, achieves its dual purpose of inducing employer to reduce the hours of work and to employ more men and of compensating employees for burden of a long work week.—Walling v. Youngerman-Reynolds Hardwood Co., U.S.Ala., 65 S.Ct. 1242, 325 U.S. 419, 89 L.Ed. 1705, rehearing denied 66 S.Ct. 12, 326 U.S. 804, 90 L.Ed. 489.

(2) The requirement of increased pay for overtime service is a remedial measure adapted to the needs of an economic and social program, rather than a police regulation adapted to the rigid enforcement required in a safety program.—Levinson v. Spector Motor Service, Ill., 67 S.Ct. 931, 330 U.S. 649, 91 L.Ed. 1158.

(3) Purpose of act generally see supra § 151 (1).

Independent vitality

Individual right

The right of time and a half for overtime, plus liquidated damages for failure to receive it, is an individual right of the employee, not a criminal sanction or even a general right given to employees' bargaining unit, and unless employee remained in company's employ for long enough time after the adoption of an increased wage scale to be paid whatever he had coming under the act before the wage scale went into effect, he has not been compensated as the act requires.—Watkins v. Hudson Coal Co., C.C.A.Pa., 151 F.2d 311, certiorari denied 66 S.Ct. 522, 327 U.S. 777, 90 L.Ed. 1005, rehearing denied 66 S.Ct. 701, 327 U.S. 816, 90 L.Ed. 1039.

Bonuses

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, it was not intended that an employer should compensate employees for overtime by granting them bonuses.—Wilkinson v. Noland Co., D.C.Va., 40 F.Supp. 1009.

Ninth hour

(1) Employee, in action for overtime compensation under territorial statute, is entitled to recover at the statutory rate for the ninth hour only in any one calendar day.—Domenech v. Pan Am. Standard Brands, D.C.Puerto Rico, 68 F.Supp. 726.

(2) If, prior to effective date of Puerto Rican act regulating working hours, employee was working seventy-two hours a week for fifteen dollars as he allegedly worked immediately thereafter, finding that parties intended that fifteen dollars should cover a seventy-two-hour week would be justified, but employee would not be precluded from recovering statutory double time for the ninth hour worked in any day.—Domenech v. Pan Am. Standard Brands, C.C.A. Puerto Rico, 148 F.2d 763.

Recovery at normal rate

Employee and employer, making contract for work in excess of maximum hours set by the law, are not in delicto to such an extent that employee cannot recover wages at normal rate for overtime actually worked in excess of nine hours per day.—Domenech v. Pan Am. Standard Brands, supra.

the statute must be given their usual and ordinary meaning and the statute requires no outside aid in its interpretation.[13] The overtime pay provision of the act is indicative of a congressional intention to guarantee either regular or overtime compensation for all actual work or employment,[14] and it necessarily implies a kind of relationship based on agreement between the employer and employee from which it is possible to determine the regular hourly rate at which the employee is employed, and contemplates a situation in which the employer agrees to pay a certain sum to the employee and has control of the hours of work by the employee.[15]

The provision for overtime pay does not regulate wages[16] but imposes a penalty on overtime work regardless of what the rate of pay may be,[17] and accordingly the requirement of overtime pay is not limited to employees receiving less than the statutory minimum per hour.[18] Also overtime beyond the maximum number of hours specified by the act must be paid at one and one half times the regular rate of pay, where that pay is above the minimum as well as where the regular pay is at the minimum,[19] and it is not enough that employees received compensation in excess of the amount they would have been paid on the basis of time and a half computed at the minimum wage provided for in the act.[20] The mere fact that a worker's hours of employment fluctuate does not insulate the worker from the protection of the overtime provisions of the act.[21]

An employer is within its rights in establishing a rule or policy prohibiting overtime work,[22] and it has the right to demand an explanation regarding the necessity for certain overtime hours worked by employees, if it acts in good faith and not for the purpose of having time worked omitted from the records.[23] However, the fact that an employee was employed for specific hours at a specific weekly wage and directed not to work overtime without the employer's permission does not affect his right to compensation for overtime work done with the knowledge of the employer.[24]

Regular and overtime rates must be computed in the manner prescribed by the act.[25] It is necessary and sufficient for compliance with the act that an employee be paid at a full one and one half times the regular rate of pay for all work in excess of forty hours during any work week,[26] and the overtime compensation must be computed by increasing the employee's regular hourly rate by fifty per cent and multiplying such figure by the number of overtime hours.[27] The overtime pay provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act does not limit the work week to forty hours,[28] and an employee may work more than forty hours per week provided he is compensated therefor as provided in the act.[29] The time worked over forty hours per week, even by piece workers, must be included in the time worked for the purpose of computing overtime.[30]

The unit of time under the act within which to distinguish regular from overtime is the week[31] and there can be no averaging of hours over two or more weeks in computing overtime compensation.[32] Also an employer may not apply amounts actually paid employees in excess of the overtime requirements of the act in some weeks, as a credit against payments in other weeks when compensation for overtime did not, in fact, equal the amounts prescribed by the act,[33] and an employer may not deduct from the amount due employees as overtime compensation the regular year-end bonuses paid to employees.[34] Where there is no evidence that an employer's payment of the full weekly wage stipulated for weeks in which the employee was absent part of the time was made under mistake of law or fact, the employer is not entitled to credit for the alleged overpayments on those weeks against the amount recoverable by the employee as overtime compensation.[35]

A full fifty per cent increase in labor costs and a full fifty per cent wage premium are meant to flow from the overtime provision of Fair Labor Standards Act; fact that employer was paying a premium for overtime employment so as to make the overtime rate somewhat above the piecework earnings per hour was immaterial in determining whether employer violated overtime provision of the act, since until that premium is fifty per cent of the actual hourly rate received from all regular sources, the provision has not been satisfied.—Walling v. Harnischfeger Corp., Wis., 65 S.Ct. 1246, 1250, 325 U.S. 427, 89 L.Ed. 1711.

Additional expense

Under provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act relating to compensation for overtime worked, employment for more than the statutory maximum number of hours is intended to entail additional expense to the employer no matter what the regular rate of employment may be, unless the employee falls within one of the exempted groups there listed.—Bumpus v. Continental Baking Co., C.C.A.Tenn., 124 F.2d 549, 140 A.L.R. 1258, certiorari denied Continental Baking Co. v. Bumpus, 62 S.Ct. 1305, 316 U.S. 704, 86 L.Ed. 1772.

Employment contract

The designation of compensation or period of work as "overtime" in employment contract does not make such compensation or period of work overtime within Fair Labor Standards Act providing that hours worked after forty during any work week are overtime for which extra compensation is allowed.—Ferrer v. Staggered shifts

Where a work week under the Fair Labor Standards Act, as interpreted by the administrator, consisted of seven days starting with the same calendar day each week, and employer established a work week of seven consecutive days beginning on Wednesday and ending on the following Tuesday, and so staggered the shifts on which plaintiff employee worked as to allow from one to four days' rest between changes of shifts, although employee worked seven consecutive days on each shift, and he drew overtime varying from ten to fifty per cent for days worked, employer did not violate the act so as to entitle employee to recover overtime for each seventh day worked.—Harned v. Atlas Powder Co., 192 S. W.2d 378, 301 Ky. 517.

35. U.S.—Hutchinson v. William C. Barry, Inc., D.C.Mass., 50 F.Supp. 292.

A work week under the act consists of seven consecutive days and it need not coincide with the calendar week but may begin on any day and at any time of any day.[36] A work schedule under which an employee has a different day off in each calendar week is not in violation of the act, so that the employee is not entitled to overtime compensation for the last day of each period of seven consecutive days worked by him.[37] Employees are entitled to time and a half, and not double time, for time worked in excess of forty hours on the seventh consecutive day,[38] and the statute does not authorize the recovery of double time for Sunday work.[39]

Employment by several employers. Generally, in the absence of collusion between several employers for whom a single employee works, a particular employer is required to pay overtime only if the employee is engaged in work for him for more than forty hours a week,[40] but it has also been held, without reference to whether the employment is joint, that where one is employed concurrently by two employers the two concurrent salaries received by the employee from both employers and the number of hours given by the employee to both jobs are to be added in determining application of provisions for minimum wages and overtime pay.[41] Where one is jointly employed by several employers, each is liable under the act for overtime compensation,[42] but, in determining whether two employers are acting independently in working an employee more than forty hours in a week, the facts of the particular case are controlling,[43] and in order to render them jointly liable for overtime compensation it must appear that both employers undertook the task involved and had joint control over its performance.[44]

b. Regular Rate of Pay

Under provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act requiring payment of overtime at one and one half times the regular rate of pay, the "regular rate" is an actual fact and means the hourly rate actually paid for the normal, nonovertime work week, including all payments which the parties have agreed shall be received during the work week, exclusive of overtime payments.

Under Fair Labor Standards Act § 7, 29 U.S.C.A. § 207, requiring work in excess of the number of hours specified to be paid for at one and one half times the "regular rate" of pay, the computation of the overtime payment to which an employee is entitled first requires a determination of the regular rate of pay.[45] The term "regular rate" is not defined in the act, and hence its meaning is the subject of judicial interpretation having in mind the purposes of the act,[46] but it has been held that the words used in the statute are not ambiguous, and do not require, for their construction, resort to the declaration of policy and the legislative history of the act.[47] The term is not to be enlarged by reference to the definition of the term "wages" found in other statutes.[48]

The question of what is the "regular rate" of compensation, on which the amount of overtime payments required by the act depends, must be determined in each case from a consideration of the

Commissary

Where commissary was located on defendant employers' plant site but was owned by a third person who was local manager of employers' plant, and employees who worked at the plant at times also worked in the commissary, the time worked by employees in the commissary could not be included in determining amount due by employers under Fair Labor Standards Act, on theory that employees were jointly employed by the employers and third person.—Fleming v. Knox, D.C.Ga., 42 F.Supp. 948.

Computation of time worked

Where night watchman of defendant employers engaged in commerce or production of goods for commerce within the Fair Labor Standards Act received twenty per cent of pay from another employer, twenty per cent of time he worked would be deducted from total of hours worked during night in determining time that he had worked for defendants.—Fleming v. facts and circumstances.[49] Although the parties may contract as to the rate of compensation, within the limits circumscribed by the statute, as is discussed infra subdivision c of this section, an employer and employee may not legally agree on a basis for overtime compensation under the act which is different from the actual basis of the employee's regular compensation.[50] The regular rate, however established, must be a bona fide rate,[51] and overtime must be paid on the basis of the employee's regular compensation regardless of what the components thereof are called, and how desirable, beneficial, or praiseworthy it may be to divide such compensation into artificial components.[52] The regular rate is an "actual fact,"[53] and, in ascertaining such rate for the purpose of determining the amount of overtime compensation payable under the act, the court must look not to the contract nomenclature but to the actual payments, exclusive of those paid for overtime, which the parties have agreed shall be paid during each work week.[54]

As a general rule the words "regular rate" mean the hourly rate actually paid for the normal, nonovertime work week,[55] and an employee's regular compensation is the compensation which regularly and actually reaches him, however indirectly, independently of whether it could be called a gratuity under some other circumstances or may shrink at some time, and regardless of the strict legal relationship between employer and employee.[56] Accordingly the term means the actual rate of pay which the employee is receiving, no matter how high, and not the minimum rate set forth in the statute.[57] However, where an employee's compensation is less than the minimum wage permitted by the act, the minimum wage is the "regular rate at which he is employed,"[58] and the basic wage paid for labor under the minimum rate provision rather than the rate of payment before the effective date of the act is the base to be used in determining overtime compensation.[59]

As a general rule the regular rate of pay, for purposes of computing overtime compensation, includes all payments which the parties have agreed shall be received during the work week, exclusive of overtime payments,[60] including piecework wa-

Gratuity

Where employees, assured that they would receive the same earnings as before, signed agreements for setting up on employer's books a wage rate lower than rate paid before date of agreements, overtime compensation was computed on lower rate, and a so-called bonus or gratuity sufficient to bring total wage for pay period to an amount equalling total hours worked during that period, multiplied by hourly rate received before date of agreements, was added, regular rate on basis of ges,[61] differential payments for working at undesirable times, such as at night or on Sundays and holidays,[62] and the cost of board and lodging customarily furnished employees.[63] The "regular rate" of pay also ordinarily includes incentive bonus[64] or profit-sharing[65] payments made in addition to the normal base pay. So where bonuses, the amount of which could be ascertained by application of a formula, were regularly paid and employees assumed that in the normal course of events they would receive such bonuses, they constituted part of the regular rate at which they were paid and were required to be considered in the computation of overtime pay, notwithstanding the bonus payments were discretionary with the employer and could be discontinued.[66] It has been held, however, that a bonus which was provided for subsequent to the earning of the compensation on which it was based is not any part of the regular rate of compensation,[67] and that annual bonuses which, although scaled according to an employee's annual income, are actually in the nature of an outright gift may not be considered as compensation with respect to the computation of base pay and overtime compensation under the act.[68] which overtime compensation was required to be computed under the Fair Labor Standards Act was agreed rate plus so-called bonus or gratuity paid at end of each week.—Carleton Screw Products Co. v. Fleming, C.C.A.Minn., 126 F.2d 537, certiorari denied 63 S.Ct. 54, 317 U.S. 634, 87 L.Ed. 511.

Piece-rate pay system

Where contract provided for piece-rate pay system under which employees' wages could exceed an established base rate, those employees who received hourly rates at least twenty per cent higher than their guaranteed base rates were paid a regular rate identical with the higher rate, and hence employer's failure to pay them for overtime labor on basis of such higher rate violated overtime provision of Fair Labor Standards Act notwithstanding contract designation of base rate as the regular rate.—Walling v. Harnischfeger Corp., Wis., 65 S.Ct. 1246, 1250, 325 U.S. 427, 89 L.Ed. 1711.

Coincident with hourly rate

Under overtime provision of Fair Labor Standards Act, in case of piece-work wages, the regular rate coincides with hourly rate actually received for all hours worked during particular work week, such rate being the quotient of amount received during the week divided by number of hours worked.—Walling v. Youngerman-Reynolds Hardwood Co., Ala., 65 S.Ct. 1242, 325 U.S. 419, 89 L.Ed. 1705, rehearing denied 66 S.Ct. 12, 326 U.S. 804, 90 L.Ed. 489.

Mine tunnels completed

Where employer guaranteed a minimum wage, but agreed that it would pay as much over that as employees were able to make on an agreed sum per foot of mine tunnel completed and, although minimum hourly rates were guaranteed, employees were paid their piece rate earnings, and employees received a greater regular rate than guaranteed minimum base rate, such piece-work wages forming only part of their normal weekly income were required to be included within statutory regular rate under Fair Labor Standards Act.—Walling v. Alaska Pac. Consol. Min. Co., C.C.A.Wash., 152 F.2d 812, certiorari denied Alaska Pac. Consol. Min. Co. v. Walling, 66 S.Ct. 960, 327 U.S. 803, 90 L.Ed. 1028.

Designation as bonus

Differential payment of five cents per hour for night shift work paid to employees under union wage contract was not a gratuity but was part of regular rate for purpose of computing overtime compensation under Fair Labor Standards Act, notwithstanding differential was designated as bonus and was not included in employer's returns to workmen's compensation insurer and was distinguished on employer's books by red ink, and under National War Labor Board's form.—Walling v. Computation

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, where a bonus was paid employees who turned out more work than stated minimum, overtime hourly rate should be one and a half times regular hourly rate, and bonus rate during overtime should be one and a half times regular bonus rate, so that, when shift on which bonus was earned was part regular time and part overtime, bonus would be at regular bonus rate for that fraction of bonus allocated pro rata to regular time, and at overtime bonus rate for that fraction allocated to overtime.—Walling v. Relation to other factors

Under provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act requiring payment of overtime at a rate not less than one and a half times the regular rate at which employee is employed, bonuses or shares of profit paid to employees need not be related to their classifications, rates, and standards for jobs, as set forth in contract, and need not be based on individual skills, wages, salaries, or accomplishments, in order to be included in the regular rate.—Walling v. Discretionary nature

It has been held that bonuses paid employees pursuant to resolutions of the corporate employer's board of directors, which were not promised in advance and were completely discretionary with the employer's manage-

It is not necessary that the exact amounts that go to make up the "regular rate" of pay be known at the time the work is done by the employee, since they may not be susceptible of computation until a later date.[69] The word "regular" does not necessarily mean unvarying,[70] and accordingly the regular rate need not be uniform in amount from work week to work week but may be subject to fluctuation because of different component factors, such as the amount of production and the size of dividends or profits.[71]

Ordinarily, where an employee works at a fixed hourly wage, his regular rate of pay is established by his contract of employment, and he is entitled under the act to receive for all hours worked in any week in excess of forty compensation at the rate of one and one half times his contract hourly wage.[72] In the case of an employee hired on a weekly or monthly basis and receiving compensation other than on an hourly basis, a computation is necessary in order to determine his regular rate of pay.[73] The act contemplates a work week as the regular unit for computing the hourly rate,[74] and as a general rule the regular hourly rate is determined by obtaining the quotient of the amount received during the week divided by the number of hours worked.[75] The regular rate of pay is not to be computed by dividing the applicable statutory minimum hours into the weekly wage of the employee.[76]

If an employee is hired on a fixed weekly salary for a work week of a fixed number of hours, his regular rate of pay is determined by dividing the

Lump sum for period

If there is no express or implied agreement for an hourly rate of pay, but there is an agreement for a lump sum covering a particular period, the hourly rate may be determined by dividing the number of hours of actual work into the specified sum for the longer period, for purpose of determining the compensation allowable under the Fair Labor Standards Act.—Schroepfer v. A. S. Abell Co., D.C.Md., 48 F.Supp. 88, affirmed, C.C.A., 138 F.2d 111, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 486, 321 U.S. 763, 88 L.Ed. 1060, rehearing denied 64 S.Ct. 1149, 322 U.S. 770, 88 L.Ed. 1595.

Fluctuating basic rates

Employment contracts between steamship companies and longshoremen union, dividing workday into regular working day and extraordinary hours and providing varying rates of pay for each hour of working days and for holidays and for varying types of cargo, compensating for extraordinary hours and special cargo at a higher rate, did not provide for payment for overtime compensation for the extraordinary hours, but provided a series of fluctuating basic rates, and rate per hour should be determined by dividing actual compensation received by number of hours worked, and overtime compensation due should be calculated on such rate.—Ferrer v. Waterman S. S. Corp., D.C.Puerto Rico, 70 F.Supp. 1.

Monthly compensation

Where an employee is compensated at a monthly salary, established formula for computing the regular hourly rate of such compensation, for purpose of applying Fair Labor Standards Act, is to multiply monthly salary by twelve and then divide by fifty-two, thus obtaining weekly rate, and then to divide weekly rate by number of hours worked each week.—Seneca Coal & Coke Co. v. agreed weekly compensation by the agreed number of hours in the week for which the compensation is paid.[77] If the employment is for a fixed weekly compensation for a week of variable or fluctuating hours, the employee's rate of pay must be determined by dividing his fixed weekly compensation by the number of hours actually worked in any work week; and in such case the regular rate of pay of an employee will necessarily vary from week to week according to the number of hours worked.[78] Where the contract does not expressly provide a regular hourly rate or the agreed compensation is not so allocated to the statutory work week and overtime hours as to make the regular rate explicit in the contract, the deficiency cannot be supplied by implication, but the regular hourly rate should be determined by dividing the total weekly compensation by the total hours worked.[79] Piecework wages must be translated into an hourly rate in the same manner, and, where the facts permit no division of piecework rates into regular and overtime segments, the court cannot arbitrarily make such division to create an artificial compliance with the act.[80]

It has been held that where employees receive more than one rate of pay during a work week, the overtime rate, at the employer's option, may be based on the average hourly rate for the entire week or on the hourly or piece rate that is applicable during the overtime hours.[81]

c. Agreements as to Rate of Pay

As a general rule, wage agreements falling within the purview of the Fair Labor Standards Act may and should establish an hourly regular rate not less than the statutory minimum and provide for overtime payments at least one and one half times the regular rate, and within the limits of the act the parties are free to establish the regular rate at any point and in any manner they see fit, but the parties may not compute the regular rate of pay in a wholly unrealistic and artificial manner so as to negate the statutory purpose for payment of overtime at one and one half times the regular rate.

As a general rule, it is necessary and sufficient that wage agreements falling within the purview

Forty-hour week

Where an employee is hired at a fixed weekly wage for a forty-hour week, the regular rate of pay is the quotient of the weekly wage divided by forty, regardless of the number of hours actually worked during the week, and he is entitled to recover overtime pay for hours worked in excess of forty hours a week.—Kappler v. Admission

Fact that employer admitted that it was mistaken in its belief that employee whom it classified as a supervisory employee was not entitled to overtime compensation required by Fair Labor Standards Act could not be construed as an admission that employee was employed at a weekly wage for a work week of only forty hours instead of for a week of variable hours.—Landreth v. Ford, Bacon & Davis, C.C.A.Ark., 147 F.2d 446.

Daily tours

Where employees worked daily tours and were paid a specified wage for each tour, to compute employees' regular rate within Fair Labor Standards Act, assuming the same wages and tours, required only the simple process of dividing the wages received for each tour by the number of hours in that tour, and the regular rate was then applicable to the first forty hours regularly worked in a week on the tours and the overtime rate became effective as to all hours worked in excess of forty.—Walling v. of the Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, establish an hourly "regular rate" not less than the statutory minimum and provide for overtime payments at least one and one half times the "regular rate."[82] In other words, agreements as to wages must contain two elements: (1) Either a stated hourly rate for regular work or a limit on the total number of hours to be worked for a fixed salary. (2) An express provision that overtime shall be paid for at time and a half the regular rate.[83] Accordingly, while contracts for a base pay equal to and for overtime pay in excess of that required by the act have been held valid,[84] it has been held, where there is no understanding that any part of the amount paid should be treated as overtime compensation, that the agreement does not comply with the act in respect of payment for overtime, notwithstanding the contract specifies a wage in excess of the minimum provided by the act and the wage was established prior to the employment.[85]

Also the payment of a fixed salary regardless of the number of hours worked in a work week does not satisfy the overtime requirements of the act notwithstanding such salary equals or exceeds the statutory minimum for regular time plus time and a half for overtime, for hours actually worked, and notwithstanding the intention of the parties that the fixed salary shall cover both regular and overtime work;[86] such a general intention may not be transformed by implication into a specific intention that overtime be paid for at time and a half the regular rate.[87] It has been held, however, that a wage plan is not rendered invalid under the act simply because, instead of stating directly an hourly rate of pay in amount consistent with the statutory requirements, the parties have stipulated a weekly wage inclusive of regular and overtime compensation for a work week in excess of forty hours and have provided a formula whereby the appropriate hourly rate may be derived therefrom.[88]

The act contemplates the setting of the "regular wage rate" in a bona fide manner through wage negotiation between the employer and employee, provided the statutory minimum is respected,[89] and, within the limits of the act, employer and employee are free to establish the regular rate of pay at any point and in any manner they see fit, and they may agree to pay compensation according to any time or work measurement they desire.[90] So it has been held, where the volume of work and hours of em-

In action for overtime compensation under federal Fair Labor Standards Act, larger amounts paid plaintiff weekly for various successive periods after first period of his employment cannot be regarded as overtime compensation under federal Fair Labor Standards Act in computing his regular rate of pay per hour for purpose of determining amount of such compensation to which he is entitled in absence of agreement that such larger payments should be accepted in satisfaction of overtime payment requirements of such act.—Quest v. New contract

With respect to liability for overtime compensation under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the employee's continuance in an employment under a new method of computing pay creates a new contract and the employee's consent to the new arrangement may be found from the continuance, notwithstanding repeated protests on his part.—Shepler v. It has been held, however, that freedom of contract does not include the right to compute the regular rate of pay in a wholly unrealistic and artificial manner so as to negate the statutory purpose,[92] and, where the contract formula for determining

Steady income

Where employer and employees have agreed on a wage arrangement which has proved mutually satisfactory, the court should not upset it and approve an inflexible and artificial interpretation of the Fair Labor Standards Act which finds no support in its text, and as a practical matter eliminates the possibility of steady income to employees with irregular hours.—Walling v. A. H. Belo Corporation, Tex., 62 S.Ct. 1223, 316 U.S. 624, 86 L.Ed. 1716, rehearing denied 63 S.Ct. 76, 317 U.S. 706, 87 L.Ed. 563.

Advice as to legality

Where employer's advice to employees regarding legality of proposed change under contract entered into two days prior to effective date of the maximum hours provision of Fair Labor Standards Act whereby hourly wage rate was reduced but the number of hours worked and total compensation received remained the same was in accord with proper interpretation of act, it could not be considered as a basis for holding the contract void.—General Mills v. Williams, C.C.A.Ohio, 132 F.2d 367, 144 A.L.R. 1371.

Different rates for different work

Employers and employees may contract for different rates of pay for different kinds of work under Fair Labor Standards Act, as long as contract is fairly made without coercion and if regular rates agreed on are not computed in a wholly artificial manner to evade requirements of the act.—Ille v. Travis Oil Corp., 164 P. 2d 998, 196 Okl. 332.

Particular agreements held valid

(1) Where employee was paid at rate of not less than one and one-half times his agreed regular rate for each hour of overtime that he worked, and employment contract provision for computing overtime earnings at one and one-half times both his fixed base rate and a fluctuating group incentive hourly rate was simple and understandable, and divided incentive wages into regular and overtime hourly segments in a realistic and mathematically workable manner, contract conformed to requirement of the Fair Labor Standards Act.—Adams v. Macklin Co., D. C.Mich., 69 F.Supp. 262.

(2) Agreement whereby oil driller was employed at twenty dollars a day and tool dressers at eighteen dollars a day with understanding that there was included in such wages, regular wages for forty hours a week and time and a half for overtime work during six days and double time for work on seventh day, so that they were not entitled to overtime compensation under the Fair Labor Standards Act, was not in contravention of the act.—Watson v. Hightower, 176 P.2d 670, 50 N.M. 322.

(3) Employment contracts providing basic hourly pay of forty-one cents per hour, which was determined by dividing employee's prior week's earnings by expected hours of work, and for time and a half for overtime, and providing for payment of weekly advance equivalent to weekly salary currently being paid to be credited with actual earned compensation, did not violate Fair Labor Standards Act.—Walling v. the "regular rate" does not in fact represent the "regular rate" of pay within the statutory meaning, and accordingly no adequate provision is made for overtime compensation, the agreement is invalid.[93] So, where the contract "regular rate" is fictitious and irregular and varies with the hours of labor to which it applies, with the result of substantially defeating the provisions of the act for time and a half pay for overtime, it will not be applied.[94] In such case the regular rate of pay will be computed by dividing the total compensation received by the number of hours worked during the week, and over-

It is the duty of the court to give effect to the intention of the parties to contract with respect to the regular rate of pay only as far as that intention complies with the law and intention of parties should not be allowed to defeat intent of congress in enacting Fair Labor Standards Act.—Murray v. Real relation to earnings

The rate established under a formula as the regular wage rate, in order to be adjudged actual and not fictitious, must either bear a real relation to actual earnings or it must be a genuine contractual decrease in wages based on bargaining.—Watkins v. Hours subject to call

Where hourly rate of pay of stock and grain brokers' employees, formerly receiving weekly salaries, was based on number of hours during which they were supposedly subject to call in each week, averaging about fifteen hours less than hours actually worked, such rate was not the actual hourly rate for purposes of overtime under Fair Labor Standards Act, especially where employees received same compensation regardless of number of hours worked.—Walling v. Particular agreements held invalid

(1) Where purpose of agreement formula for determining hourly rates of employees who were regularly employed more than forty hours per week was to reduce hourly rate sufficiently so that payment of time and a half for overtime would not bring total weekly earnings substantially above weekly rates set by agreement and effect of use of formula was to make any increase in employee's pay above regular weekly rate dependent not on overtime in excess of forty hours but on overtime computed only in excess of agreed work week, the "hourly rate" derived from use of the formula was not the "regular rate" of pay within meaning of Fair Labor Standards Act and hence the agreement did not deprive employees of right to overtime compensation and damages.—149 Madison Ave. Corp. v. Asselta, N.Y., 67 S.Ct. 1178, 331 U.S. 199, 91 L.Ed. 1432, 169 A.L.R. 1293.

(2) Where each daily shift or tour was divided into two parts to the first of which was assigned a specified hourly rate described as the base or regular rate, and second part was treated as overtime and called for payment of one and one half times the base or regular rate, but the regular and overtime rates were calculated so as to insure that total wages for each tour would continue the same as under prior contract, the contract did not satisfy the overtime requirement of the Fair Labor Standards Act.—Walling v. Helmerich & Payne, Okl., 65 S.Ct. 11, 323 U.S. 37, 89 L.Ed. 29—Walling v. Alaska Pac. Consol. Min. Co., C.C.A.Wash., 152 F.2d 812, certiorari denied Alaska Pac. Consol. Min. Co. v. Walling, 66 S.Ct. 960, 327 U.S. 803, 90 L.Ed. 1028.

(3) Arrangement whereby employee was to be paid the basic rate in excess of statutory minimum for first forty hours and one and one half times such basic rate for twenty hours but employee was to work irregular hours and put in time as having worked sixty hours each week, the contract was illegal because it fixed an arbitrary period on which computation of regular and overtime rate would be made.—Webb v. Brady Transfer Storage Co., D.C.Iowa, 72 F.Supp. 170.

(4) A wage practice plan adopted by employer of paying one hour a week or month to each employee at one rate contended to be the regular base rate, and then paying employees for all the rest of the hours of the week or month one and one half times such alleged base or regular rate, did not comply with overtime provisions of Fair Labor Standards Act.—Walling v. Arctic Circle Exploration, D.C.Wash., 56 F.Supp. 944.

(5) A split-day plan by which employees are paid a different wage scale for different hours in the day for same kind of work, one scale for regular work and a lower scale for overtime, constitutes an evasion of Fair Labor Standards Act.—Ille v. Travis Oil Corp., 164 P.2d 998, 196 Okl. 332.

(6) Where normal work day consisted of eight hours before and after passage of Fair Labor Standards Act, split-day plan under which work day was divided into two parts, the first of which was assigned a reduced straight or regular hourly rate of pay, and second of which was treated as overtime, with the result that daily wage for eight-hour work day continued substantially as it had been prior to the act, was illegal.—Robertson v. Alaska Juneau Gold Min. Co., C.C.A.Cal., 157 F.2d 876.

Artificial compliance

Where facts do not permit it, court cannot arbitrarily divide bonuses or piecework wages into regular and overtime segments, thereby creating an artificial compliance with overtime provision of Fair Labor Standards Act.—Walling v. Harnischfeger Corp., Wis., 65 S.Ct. 1246, 1250, 325 U.S. 427, 89 L.Ed. 1711.

Co., C.C.A.Wash., 152 F.2d 812, certiorari denied Alaska Pac. Consol. Min. Co. v. Walling, 66 S.Ct. 960, 327 U.S. 803, 90 L.Ed. 1028—Watkins v. Effect of contract

Contract to pay welders a dollar an hour and helpers fifty cents per hour for regular time with provision that if overtime were worked the regular rate would be lowered so that regulate rate plus overtime rate would average the same as regular rate without overtime was in effect a contract to pay straight time regardless of time worked and did not comply with Fair Labor Standards Act.—Walling v. Green Head Bit & Supply Co., C.C.A.Okl., 138 F.2d 453.

time will be calculated on such rate, as discussed supra subdivision b of this section.

The substance of a contract, rather than its mere form, determines its compliance with the Fair Labor Standards Act,[95] and the fact that employers actually apply in all situations the hourly rates derived by the use of a certain formula does not validate such rates, since the manner in which the hourly rate is determined, and not the application of an hourly rate, is the test of its validity under the act.[96] It has been held that once the parties have decided on the amount of wages and the mode of payment the determination of the regular rate becomes a matter of mathematical computation, the result of which is not affected by any designation of a contrary "regular rate" in the wage contracts.[97]

It has been held that where a contract establishes a basic rate, and a higher rate is provided for work during certain hours or on certain days, and such higher rate, although called "overtime rate," bears no relation to the hours worked in excess of forty, the contract in effect establishes a series of fluctuating regular or basic rates, and the regular rate is to be determined by dividing the wages actually paid by the hours actually worked although the rates vary from week to week.[98] It has also been held, however, that the act does not forbid a bona fide agreement for a shorter work week than forty hours to which the regular rate shall apply,[99] and that an employment contract may fix regular or basic rates of pay and provide for an increase in the basic rates for excess hours or work performed at unusual or undesirable hours, and provide that the regular or basic rate be used in computing overtime, as long as the basic rate and overtime do not violate the provisions of the act.[1]

§ 151(27). —— What Constitutes Wages and Compensation

a. In general
b. Payment in cash or services

a. In General

The provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act with respect to minimum "wages" and overtime "compensation" use the quoted words synonymously as referring to remuneration for services rendered by employees; "wages" are not limited to money passing directly from the employer to the employee.

The meaning of the word "wages" as used in the Fair Labor Standards Act § 1 et seq, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, must be deduced from the provisions of the act in the light of its legislative purpose,[2] and it has been held that provisions of the act with respect to minimum "wages" and overtime "compensation" use the quoted words synonymously as referring to remuneration for services rendered by employees.[3] Except for the requirement that workers in certain industries receive a compensation at least as great as that fixed by the act, an employer is left free in so far as the act is concerned to work out the compensation problem in his own way.[4]

Wages are not limited to money passing directly from the employer to the employee,[5] and, although the act generally contemplates that the employee shall be paid his wages by the employer out of the employer's funds, it does not prohibit the imposition on the employee of the duty of collecting the employer's money and granting the employee the privilege of paying himself out of it subject to accounting, provided the employer stands ready to pay promptly any balance due the employee.[6] The word "wages" has no fixed meaning in the act as either including or excluding gratuities received by employees from others,[7] so that, by agreement between employer and employee, tips received by the employee may be considered a part of the employee's wage,[8] and where such tips exceed the lawful minimum wages no recovery may be had against the employer.[9] The act was not intended to do away with tipping or to give tipping employment an earnings preference over the nonservice vocations.[10]

An employer is not entitled to a credit on its wage liability to an employee for the amount paid to the employee for two weeks' wages after his discharge.[11]

b. Payment in Cash or Services

Generally, wages due under the Fair Labor Standards Act must be paid to the employee in cash or by negotiable instrument payable at par, clear of all deductions, but it is provided that the wage paid to an employee includes the reasonable cost to the employer of board, lodging, or other facilities customarily furnished the employee by the employer.

As a general rule, the minimum wage and overtime compensation prescribed by the Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, must be paid to the employee in cash or by negotiable instrument payable at par, except as otherwise permit-

Necessity of contract

Where it did not appear that moneys collected and retained by redcaps employed by a union terminal company were personal gifts and not compensation for service which company hired redcaps to perform, no contract was necessary to make such moneys the money of the company, since proceeds of the thing which an employee is hired to do belong as a matter of law to employer.—Union Terminal Co. v. No violation of law

(1) Redcaps could not complain that, if carriers took credit for tips received by redcaps as compensation for redcap service, it would be in effect a charge for transportation service, and, since carriers filed no covering tariff, a violation of Interstate Commerce Act, and that the provision prohibiting special rates was also violated because the indigent received redcap service without charge, since the Interstate Commerce Act provides for damages to persons injured by unlawful acts and punishment of carrier or its agents, and redcaps would have no right of action under such act.—Williams v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., Fla., 62 S.Ct. 659, 315 U.S. 386, 66 L.Ed. 914, rehearing denied 62 S. Ct. 909, 315 U.S. 830, 86 L.Ed. 1224 —Pickett v. Ass'n of St. Louis, Mo., C.C.A.Mo., 126 F.2d 421.

(2) Requirement by terminal railway company that tips received by redcaps be considered wages paid by company was not invalid on ground that there was no uniformity of "tips" which constituted a charge made to passengers for redcap service and which was therefore in violation of interstate commerce act providing that no common carrier shall by any special rate, rebate, draw back or other device charge or receive from any person or persons, greater or less compensation for services rendered than it charges or receives from others for a like service.—Harrison v. Kansas City Terminal Ry. Co., D.C.Mo., 36 F.Supp. 434, affirmed, C.C.A., 126 F.2d 422.

Effect of notice to employees

(1) A written notice to redcaps referring to Fair Labor Standards Act and requiring redcaps, in consideration of engaging in handling of baggage, to report tips received to terminal company which guaranteed that compensation including tips would equal minimum wage provided by such act, and stating that excess tips might be retained, transferred to railroads' credit so much of tips as the notice affected, in determining whether tips received by redcaps could be considered as wages within the act.—Williams v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., Fla., 62 S.Ct. 659, 315 U.S. 386, 66 L.Ed. 914, rehearing denied 62 S.Ct. 909, 315 U.S. 830, 86 L.Ed. 1224—Pickett v. (2) Where redcaps, although protesting, continued to work after receiving written notice a new contract was created, since the employer after notice may keep all earnings arising from the business; but if redcap did not accept terms offered by written notice he would be a volunteer and not an employee and as a volunteer could probably keep his tips but would not be entitled to a contractual wage.—Williams v. ted by the act.[12] Furthermore, employers are under an absolute obligation to pay the prescribed wage clear of all deductions except those permissible on conditions imposed by a provision of the act regarding consideration of services furnished the employee as part of the "wage" paid to him.[13]

Under § 3 (m) of the act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 203 (m), the "wage" paid to any employee includes the reasonable cost, as determined by the administrator, to the employer of furnishing such employee with board, lodging, or other facilities, if such board, lodging, or other facilities are customarily furnished by such employer to his employees.[14] Such provision relates to the situation where wages are paid partly in cash and partly in facilities for the benefit of the employee, and, where such provision applies, cash wages may be less than the statutory minimum as long as the reasonable cost of the facilities furnished makes up the difference,[15] but to be reckoned as wages, the facilities furnished must have been customarily furnished to employees as part of wages.[16]

The provision that "wages" includes the reasonable cost of facilities customarily furnished employees does not prohibit mutual accountings between employer and employees for advances and services given employees by the employer, so as to require the employer to give the employee his full wage in cash and the employee to immediately repay the employer for the advances made and the services performed.[17] Likewise, such provision does not prohibit an employer and employee from agreeing on an amount payable by the employee for house rent or for the purchase price of an article of merchandise, provided the employer does not realize a prohibited profit, and does not prevent an agreement that such rent or price may be deducted from the wage due.[18] The provision is permissive to the employer as to how a portion of the required wages may be paid, but it imposes a condition that the facility shall be charged at its reasonable cost as determined by the administrator.[19] The restrictions of the provision permitting only the reasonable cost of facilities furnished by the employer to be considered as wages are applicable regardless of whether

An employer, who was engaged in the production of goods for interstate commerce, by issuing scrip, which had no regular redemption date, and which was not negotiable at par, for wages to employees who were employed at scheduled rates equal to bare minima prescribed by Fair Labor Standards Act as payment of their regular wages and overtime compensation, was violating the act, and there was no basis for a distinction between scrip so issued at or after end of the pay period and scrip issued prior thereto.—Fleming v. Intent of congress in declaring that wage paid any employee includes reasonable cost, as determined by administrator, to employer of furnishing employee with certain facilities customarily furnished, was to protect basic minimum wage and overtime compensation required to be paid from profiteering or manipulation by employer in dealings with employees and to prevent increases in charges for rent, board, groceries and merchandise so as to offset increase in wages.—Walling v. Peavy-Wilson Lumber Co., D.C.La., 49 F. Supp. 846.

The phrase "or other facilities" as used in provision declaring that wage includes reasonable cost to employer of furnishing employee with certain facilities customarily furnished, includes relation of landlord and tenant, and merchant and customer.—Walling v. Peavy-Wilson Lumber Co., supra.

The word "wage," as used in provision that wage paid to any employee includes reasonable cost as determined by the administrator to the employer of furnishing such employee with board, lodging, or other facilities, refers to wage payments other than in money.—Williams v. Housing

Where contract between railway company and its maintenance of way employees fixed compensation of section laborers at specified sum per hour, without additional benefits of housing, board, etc., and company provided housing without rental charge for some section laborers, who received same wages as those not furnished houses, before passage of Fair Labor Standards Act, company did not customarily furnish such laborers houses as part of their wages and hence was not entitled to allowance for reasonable cost of housing furnished other such laborers as part of minimum wages required to be paid them by order of Administrator of Wage and Hour Division under authority of such act.—Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees v. the deductions from wages are voluntary on the part of the employee.[20]

A regulation by the administrator under the provision declaring that the wage paid to any employee includes the reasonable cost, as determined by the administrator, to the employer of furnishing the employee with certain facilities customarily furnished, is binding as legislation and cannot be set aside or modified by the courts unless palpably arbitrary or capricious or unless unconstitutional.[21] The statutory provision does not contemplate a determination of reasonable cost of facilities furnished by each individual employer, and the establishment of a general regulation pursuant to which the cost of such facilities may be calculated is sufficient.[22] Under the statute the administrator is not required to hold a formal hearing prior to promulgation of his determination of what constitutes "reasonable cost."[23]

Under a regulation promulgated pursuant to the statutory authorization, the term "reasonable cost" is defined as actual cost to the employer,[24] and is determined to be the cost of operation and maintenance including adequate depreciation plus a reasonable allowance for interest on the depreciated amount of capital invested by the employer, as arrived at under good accounting practices.[25] Such regulation is proper notwithstanding, by reason of peculiar circumstances, the actual cost of the goods or services furnished the employee is much lower than the fair value.[26] Under the regulation, "reasonable cost" does not include a profit to the employer or to any affiliated person.[27] The administrator's regulation may properly provide that the cost of furnishing facilities primarily for the benefit of the employer will not be recognized as reasonable, and that such facilities include tools of trade and other materials incidental to carrying on the employer's business.[28] However, where the pay received by employees after deductions for tools and equipment purchased from the employer equaled or exceeded the statutory minimum, there was no violation of the minimum wage requirement of the act.[29]

A deduction may properly be made on voluntary assignment by the employee to pay a sum for the benefit of the employee to a creditor, donee, or third person, provided the employer or one acting in the employer's behalf derives no profit or benefit from the transaction,[30] but a wage deduction is prohibit-

§ 151(28). —— What Constitutes Compensable Time

What constitutes working time is a question of fact depending on the particular circumstances and must be determined in accordance with common sense and the general concept of work or employment.

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, §§ 6, 7, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 206, 207, providing for minimum wages and overtime pay for designated classes of employees, it is frequently necessary to determine the number of hours comprising an employee's work week; and this in turn involves determination of whether time spent by the employee in particular activities connected in one way or another with his employment is to be included in the computation of his compensable working time.[33] In general it may be said that what constitutes working time is a question of fact depending on the particular circumstances,[34] and such question must be determined in accordance with common sense and the general concept of work or employment.[35]

The "work week" under the statute has been held to include all time during which an employee is necessarily required to be on the employer's premises on duty or at a prescribed work place.[36] The

Split-second absurdities

The work week contemplated by the Fair Labor Standards Act must be computed in the light of the realities of the industrial world, and split-second absurdities in computing the work week are not justified by the actualities of working conditions or by the policy of the act.—Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., Mich., 66 S.Ct. 1187, 328 U.S. 680, 90 L.Ed. 1515, rehearing denied 67 S. Ct. 25, 329 U.S. 822, 91 L.Ed. 699.

Time held compensable

(1) Where members of fire department in ordnance plant on a twenty-four hour day basis were on active duty for sixteen hours and on call in dormitories for eight hours and were paid straight time for all hours up to forty hours per week and time and a half for excess including any time worked while on duty, they should be paid overtime required by Fair Labor Standards Act for answering roll call, acting in relief capacities or performing similar tasks and duties necessary in connection with their employment.—Eustice v. Federal Cartridge Corp., D.C.Minn., 66 F.Supp. 55.

(2) Time consumed by employees who are employed on piecework basis in cleaning and oiling their machines and in sorting and attaching to record sheets work tickets detached from garments on which they had worked, which tickets were used for making up pay roll, should be counted as hours "worked."—Walling v. Frank, D.C.Ky., 62 F.Supp. 261.

(3) Conference time and time spent attending employer's school of instruction were spent at employer's direction, and overtime compensation should be paid therefor.—Chepard v. May, D.C.N.Y., 71 F.Supp. 389.

(4) Where night watchman was at all times watching property used in interstate commerce, time spent in selling dry ice which constituted but a small part of duties and was merely incidental to main duties as watchman, janitor and gatekeeper was not deductible in computing overtime wages due under Fair Labor Standards Act.—Martin v. Graham Ship-By-Truck Co., Mo.App., 176 S.W.2d 842.

Time held not compensable

(1) Time during which an employee is absent from work because of illness has been held not to constitute compensable work time.—Mid-Continent Petroleum Corp. v. Keen, C.C.A.Iowa, 157 F.2d 310.

(2) A bookkeeper seeking to recover for overtime compensation pursuant to Fair Labor Standards Act was not entitled to have included in his working hours the time spent by him in obtaining instruction in cost accounting.—Cassone v. Wm. Edgar John & Associates, 57 N.Y.S.2d 169, 185 Misc. 573.

Retroactive effect of determination

Where employer relied on Fair Labor Standards Act as administered and interpreted by Wage and Hour Administrator and the courts in computing work week and representative of administrator approved method of computing time and overtime at employer's plant, employer would not be retroactively liable for unpaid overtime compensation or minimum wages for preliminary activities and time consumed in walking to and from work benches and to and from cafeteria even if such activities and time were to be considered compensable under Fair Labor Standards Act.—Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., D.C.Mich., 69 F.Supp. 710.

36. U.S.—Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., Mich., 66 S.Ct. 1187, 328 U.S. 680, 90 L.Ed. 1515, rehearing denied 67 S.Ct. 25, 329 U.S. 822, 91 L.Ed. 699.

Vacation week

"Work week" means a week during which work is performed, and hence, overtime compensation cannot be recorded for week during which employee was on vacation and

mere fact that the employee is in some small degree deprived of some freedom of action does not alone determine the question, or constitute the time during which such deprivation occurs working time;[37] there must be a giving up by the employee of a substantial measure of time and effort.[38] On the other hand, the mere fact that a particular act necessary in the performance of an employee's task was not expressly ordered or directed by his superior does not establish that the time spent in doing such act was not working time.[39] An employee may be working, even though he is exerting no manual labor,[40] as during periods wherein he is charged with responsibility for the proper operation of machinery under his charge and periods in which he is obliged to remain on or near the premises to enable him to carry such responsibility properly.[41]

Under the Portal-To-Portal Act of 1947 § 2, 29 U.S.C.A. § 252, providing that no employer shall be subjected to liability for nonpayment of minimum wages or overtime compensation under the Fair Labor Standards Act and certain other statutes for activities performed by an employee prior to the enactment of the statute unless such activities at the time they were performed were compensable either by express contractual provision or by reason of custom or practice, it has been held that time spent by an employee in an activity which was compensable at the time under the terms of the employee's contract constitutes compensable working time under the Fair Labor Standards Act.[42] In the absence of such a statute, however, or of any other statutory provision to the contrary, it has been held that a custom or contract not to consider certain work within the compass of the work week or not to compensate employees for certain portions of their work should be disregarded if it deprives the employee of his statutory rights;[43] but this rule would not foreclose reasonable provisions of a contract or custom governing the computation of work hours where precisely accurate computation is difficult or impossible.[44]

Waiting, resting, or sleeping time. Where an employee is engaged in active work for part of the time but because of the nature of the job is also required to spend a considerable part of the time in a stand-by capacity, as in the case of a watchman or caretaker, or waiting on call or for the arrival of active work, the question frequently arises whether time so spent is working time. Although "being available for work" is by no means synonymous with "working,"[45] it has been said that there is no principle of law which precludes waiting time from being working time,[46] and this has been held performed no work for employer.—Plourde v. Massachusetts Cities Realty Co., D.C.Mass., 47 F.Supp. 668.

Rule governing lateness

Three-minute rule of employer whereby an employee three minutes late is not allowed to go to work until a quarter of an hour following the time at which he was supposed to check in is not unreasonable, under Fair Labor Standards Act.—Fleming v. Stillman, D.C. Tenn., 48 F.Supp. 609.

Necessity of approval of overtime

Employers' rule that employees have their hours of work especially set and that, in order for them to be entitled to overtime, if they work after the hour set at which they are to quit, they must have overtime approved by manager, is reasonable.—Fleming v. Stillman, supra.

Limitation on compensable overtime

The rule permitting reasonable computation of hours actually worked by one subject to call at all hours was inapplicable where employer and employee had undertaken in advance of the work being done to say how much overtime ought to be allowed and that so much and no more would be paid for, without restriction as to how much would necessarily be required.—Wilson Oil Co. v. true even as to waiting time devoted to idleness and recreation.[47] Nevertheless it is impossible to lay down any arbitrary rule, and the determination of whether time so spent is or is not working time depends on the facts of the particular case,[48] although considerable weight will generally be given to administrative rulings and declarations on the question.[49]

One of the tests often applied is the degree to which the employee is free to engage in personal activities during periods of idleness and the number of consecutive hours that the employee is subject to call without being required to perform active work.[50] Another consideration is whether the employee is required to remain on or about the premises during such waiting time or is required merely to leave word where he can be reached in the event of a call and is not tied down to any particular place,[51] although the fact that the employee is required to live on the premises and is subject to call at any time does not mean that he is necessarily working twenty-four hours a day;[52] and it has been held that if, in fact, provision is made for ample consecutive hours of sleep on the employer's premises, subject to calls which are infrequent enough to be inconsequential, such sleeping time is not working time;[53] but there is authority to the

"Waiting time" defined

The time spent by messengers standing by on call waiting to work was "time worked."—Walling v. Bank of Waynesboro, D.C.Ga., 61 F. Supp. 384—Walling v. Allied Messenger Service, D.C.N.Y., 47 F.Supp. 773.

Drivers

The waiting periods between trips should be included in the total number of hours motor bus driver was employed, where driver was expected to be on the job during such periods which were not long enough to permit him to go elsewhere or to engage in other activities.—Travis v. Ray, D.C.Ky., 41 F.Supp. 6.

Watchmen and guards

(1) Plant guards of steel company who were compelled to remain at plant during strike, who were on duty for two eight hour shifts one day and one eight hour shift the next, but who were subject to call at all times and were sometimes called for service while off duty, performed "work" twenty-four hours each day. —Campbell v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., D.C.Pa., 70 F.Supp. 996.

(2) Where there was substantial evidence that night watchman performed duties at all hours during the time spent at employer's place of business, any time spent in napping in intervals between arrival of trucks and performance of his duties as watchman was not deductible in determining compensation due him under Fair Labor Standards Act.—Martin v. Graham Ship-By-Truck Co., Mo.App., 176 S.W.2d 842.

(3) In computing the hours worked by a night watchman for the purpose of determining whether watchman was entitled to overtime compensation, sleeping time was not to be deducted from working time.—Aufiero v. E. A. Laboratories, 69 N.Y.S.2d 217, 271 App.Div. 1024.

Oiling and inspection

Where not in excess of forty hours per week were required by employee in which to perform actual physical work of oiling and inspecting machinery of water wells and in keeping premises and machinery clean, but employee lived on premises and was subject to call any time day or night and often received calls during nighttime, employee worked twelve hours a day.—Harris v. Crossett Lumber Co., D.C.Ark., 62 F.Supp. 856.

Firemen

Firemen employed at ordnance plant on military reservation were entitled to recover overtime compensation under the Fair Labor Standards Act, as "employees" in a standby capacity and as for "working time," for so-called sleeping period during which firemen were required to remain within hailing distance of fire station in readiness to answer fire alarms.—Bell v. Porter, D.C.Ill., 66 F.Supp. 49.

56. U.S.—Howard v. Southern Continental Co., D.C.Tenn., 72 F.Supp. 276—Bohn v. B & B Ice & Coal Co., D.C.Ky., 63 F.Supp. 1020—Muldowney v. Seaberg Elevator Co., D.C.N.Y., 39 F.Supp. 275.

Oil pumpers engaged in active work during part of the working day, and subject to call during other parts or the remainder of the day, were held not to be working during waiting periods, where during such waiting time they were not required to remain on the employer's premises or at any particular place.—Thompson v. Loring Oil Co., D.C.La., 50 F.Supp. 213.

Watchman

Where sole duty of one employed by oil well drilling contractor as watchman on lease was to live on premises adjacent to contractor's stacked oil rigs, his only other service thereon was occasional draining of water from rigs, and he was later required to live on another lease acquired by contractor and pump well thereon for five hours each day, he did not perform personal services for employer in excess of maximum hours per work week allowed under Federal Fair Labor Standards Act and could not recover overtime compensation thereunder.—Perry v. George P. Livermore, Inc., Tex.Civ. App., 165 S.W.2d 782.

Driver

In computing truck driver's compensation, continuous waiting time of one and three-fourths hours, during which he was free to follow his own personal activities and not required to be at any particular place or subject to immediate call, between trains, should be deducted.—Thompson v. Daugherty, D.C.Md., 40 F. Supp. 279.

Telephone operator

Telephone operator, in country village having forty-five telephones, who was subject to call twenty-four hours a day, was not entitled to overtime wages or penalties under the Fair Labor Standards Act, where her actual working time did not add up to more than one hour out of each twenty-four hours.—Munn v. Southwestern States Tel. Co., D.C. Tex., 52 F.Supp. 663.

Firemen

(1) Where firemen were required to be on duty for twenty-four consecutive hours, approximately one third of which time was set aside for sleeping and recreation subject to call, but there was no material interruption of such rest or sleep period by calls, the time spent by the firemen during such period otherwise than on active duty in response to calls was not working time.—Bell v. Porter, C.C.A.Ill., 159 F.2d 117—Bowers v. Remington Rand, C.C.A.Ill., 159 F.2d 114—Rokey v. Day & Zimmerman, C.C.A.Iowa, 157 F.2d 734—Plummer v. Harvester War Depot, D. C.Ohio, 70 F.Supp. 495—Eustice v. Federal Cartridge Corp., D.C.Minn., 66 F.Supp. 55—Bridgeman v. Ford, Bacon & Davis, D.C.Ark., 64 F.Supp. 1006.

(2) Where day fireman in packing company's fire-fighting department did not work in excess of maximum hours per week as provided by Fair Labor Standards Act, and fireman stayed at fire hall some nights subject to emergency calls which for each man on duty were very trivial, time spent in hall at night subject to call was not "work" within the act.—Buckner v. Armour & Co., D.C. Tex., 53 F.Supp. 1022.

57. U.S.—Eustice v. Federal Cartridge Corp., D.C.Minn., 66 F.Supp. 55.

Firemen

Where firemen were on active duty sixteen hours and had eight hour rest period required to be spent at fire stations, and some firemen spent twenty minutes of rest period each night in inspecting fire trucks, etc., time spent for such inspection constituted "employment time."—Bridgeman v. Ford, Bacon & Davis, D.C.Ark., 64 F.Supp. 1006.

Travel or transportation time. Under the Portal-To-Portal Act of 1947, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 251–262, an employer cannot be subjected to liability because of his failure to pay an employee minimum wages or overtime compensation in accordance with the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act for time spent by such employee in walking, riding, or traveling to and from the actual place of performance of the principal activity which such employee is employed to perform, unless the time so spent was, during the period for which compensation is claimed, compensable either under the terms of an express written or unwritten contract or by virtue of an existing custom or practice.[59] In the absence of such a statute, however, the question whether time spent by an employee in getting to and from the actual place of work or point of duty on the employer's premises constitutes compensable working time under the Fair Labor Standards Act has been held to depend on the facts of the particular case.[60]

Thus, it has been held that time spent in necessary travel from the place of check-in to the post of duty is time spent for the employer's benefit and subject to its control and, hence, is compensable work time;[61] and, where the employer transports the employees to and from work which is at some distance from the employer's main establishment, and such transportation is necessary for the conduct of the employer's business and maintained primarily for its benefit and not primarily for the benefit and convenience of the employees, the time spent being so transported is work time.[62] On the other hand, time spent by the employee in traveling from his home to the place of employment is not ordinarily held to constitute work time;[63] and even where the employer, for the employee's convenience, furnishes free and optional transportation to and from the place of employment and the employee's duties begin and end at such place, the time spent in traveling on such means of transportation has been held not to constitute work time.[64] In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, time spent by

Emergency instructions

Where employees in plant manufacturing carbon black were not required to stay on premises during lunch hour, they were not entitled to overtime for such period under Fair Labor Standards Act because of general instructions that, when power cuts off for any reason, they must within five minutes thereafter begin to turn off gas throughout the plant.—Thomas v. Offset of relief periods

An employer cannot offset employees' relief periods against times between their reporting for roll call and commencement of their work shifts in calculating their pay.—Ballard v. Consolidated Steel Corp., supra.

Walking to work bench

The minimum time necessarily spent after punching time clocks by employees in walking on the employer's premises at an ordinary rate along the most direct route from time clocks to work benches was "working time" which must be compensated for under the Fair Labor Standards Act.—Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., Mich., 66 S.Ct. 1187, 328 U.S. 680, 90 L.Ed. 1515, rehearing denied 67 S.Ct. 25, 329 U.S. 822, 91 L.Ed. —.

Effect of custom or contract

Prior to the enactment of the Portal-To-Portal Act relieving employers of liability for failure to compensate employees for time spent in walking, riding, or traveling to the actual place of performance of their principal activities except where such time was compensable under a custom or contract in existence at the time, it was held that the rule stated in the text was applicable even where there was a contrary custom or contractual provision.—Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., supra—Jewell Ridge Coal Corp. v. Local No. 6167, United Mine Workers of America, Va., 65 S.Ct. 1063, 325 U.S. 161, 89 L.Ed. 1534, rehearing denied 65 S.Ct. 1550, 325 U.S. 897, 89 L.Ed. 2007—Tennessee Coal, Iron & Railroad Co. v. Test of benefit

In determining whether transportation to and from work furnished employees by employer was or was not primarily in the interest of the employer, the effect of failure to furnish transportation upon employer's business must be considered.—Walling v. Anaconda Copper Min. Co., supra.

Transportation from place of check-in

Where the work is performed at some distance from the place of check-in and the day's work ends at the place of performance, after which the employees are free to go home directly or to avail themselves of the employer's free return transportation to the place of check-in, the time spent in returning to such place is not compensable work time; but, where the employees are required, as in the case of drivers, to make the return trip to the place of check-in before being relieved of their duties, the time of such return miners in underground travel from portal to portal, as distinguished from face to face, of the mine workings constitutes compensable work time.[65] Where the amount of time necessarily spent in traveling is negligible, the de minimis rule is applicable and such time will be disregarded in computing working hours.[66]

Time spent in preparatory activities. Except in so far as the rule has been changed by the Portal-To-Portal Act of 1947 which limits the liability of employers for time spent by their employees in preliminary activities, it has been held that time spent by employees in preliminary activities necessarily prerequisite to productive work, and required by the employer and pursued necessarily for the employer's benefit, constitutes working time for which the employees are entitled to compensation in accordance with the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act;[67] but time spent in preparatory activities voluntarily undertaken by employees outside of their regular working time and pursued primarily for their own convenience does not constitute work time.[68] Time required to be spent by an employee in checking in or waiting to punch a time clock will not ordinarily be deemed compensable working time where the length of time so spent is not considerable.[69] If an employee for his own convenience arrives at the plant earlier than necessary, he is not entitled to compensation for the period between the time he arrives and the time he is required to commence work.[70] As a general rule, insubstantial and insignificant periods of time spent in preliminary activities need not be included in computing the compensable work week of an employee.[71]

Conclusiveness of time records. Time sheets prepared by the employer and signed by the employee are not conclusive against the employee if they do not correctly reflect the amount of time worked by the employee;[72] they are not binding on the employee as contracts;[73] nor will the employee be held bound by such time sheets on the ground of long delay in advising the employer of the errors.[74]

Changing uniforms

The time spent by employee in obtaining clean uniforms when gotten before beginning of scheduled working period and the time spent in changing clothes was spent in activity solely for convenience of the employee, and hence was not compensable.—McIntyre v. What constitutes considerable time

(1) A workable formula for determining whether the time required to punch a time clock was considerable could not be arrived at by measuring it against either the free time of the employee or his working time, but the true test was whether employee was unreasonably deprived of time which he should have had free.—Cameron v. Bendix Aviation Corp., D.C.Pa., 65 F.Supp. 510.

§ 151(29). —— Increase or Reduction of Wages

The Fair Labor Standards Act does not require any increase in wages to those already receiving more than the minimum, and a provision that the act shall not justify the reduction of a wage which is in excess of the applicable minimum wage does not preclude an agreement reducing the hourly rate but maintaining the number of hours worked and the total compensation received, provided the statutory minimum is respected.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 1 et seq, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, does not require any increase in wages to those already receiving more than the minimum.[76] Accordingly, an employer is not barred from contracting with his employees to pay them the same wages they received previously, as long as the new rate equals or exceeds the minimum required by the act.[77]

It is provided by § 18 of the act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 218, that no provision of the act shall justify any employer in reducing a wage paid by him which is in excess of the applicable minimum wage under the act, or justify any employer in increasing hours of employment maintained by him which are shorter than the maximum hours applicable under the act.[78] Such provision was intended primarily to discourage the possible tendency that the minimum wage fixed in the act would become the maximum wage paid by employers,[79] and to preclude reliance on the act as justification for reducing wages to the minimum or increasing hours to the maximum requirements.[80] However, it has been held that the act fails to provide any penalties for violation of such provision,[81] and that the provision is to be construed as merely prohibiting any employer from breaching a binding contract for the purpose of reducing wages or increasing hours of employment.[82] The provision does not outlaw agreements between employer and employee regarding hours and wages so long as other provisions of the act relating to minimum wages and overtime pay are not violated,[83] and it does not invalidate a contract entered into shortly prior to the effective date of the act reducing the hourly rate but maintaining the number of hours worked and the total compensation received.[84] So, an employee whose wages were reduced at the time of adoption of the statute but not below the minimum requirements of the statute may not recover from the employer the amount of wages of which he was deprived by the reduction.[85] It has been held, on the other hand, that employees are entitled to overtime compensation based on the rate received at the time of a determination that they were subject to the act, rather than at the rate to which their pay was arbitrarily reduced by the employer after such determination.[86]

§ 151(30). Powers and Duties of Administrator Generally

The Fair Labor Standards Act authorizes the appointment of an administrator of the wage and hour division and confers on him various powers and duties with respect to the administration of the act.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 4, 29 U.S.C.A. § 204, provides for the appointment of an administrator of the wage and hour division, and generally grants him authority to appoint employees to carry out his functions and duties under the statute, requires him to make reports annually and recommendations for further legislation, and imposes other duties on him with respect to administration of the act,[87] including the duty to enforce the provisions of the act and to compel compliance therewith.[88] The character of authority delegated to the administrator is to be gauged on the assumption that the authority delegated is for the purpose of meeting practical problems arising in the administration of the act, and it will be assumed that the authority delegated is of such a nature as would not conflict with powers concurrently or previously conferred by congress on the courts.[89] Authority delegated to the administrator cannot be exercised arbitrarily or in a way which has no reasonable relation to the question involved.[90]

Valid regulations of the administrator within the power delegated under the statute have the force and effect of legislative enactments,[91] and speak with the authority of law,[92] provided they reasonably construe the language and clear intention of the act.[93] The administrator has implied power under the general terms of the act to prohibit homeworkers from doing work in a particular industry without obtaining a homework certificate.[94] The administrator has the right and duty to construe the language of the statute if fairly susceptible of more than one interpretation; but, where the meaning thereof is definite and clear, it cannot be altered.[95] The rulings and interpretations of the administrator are not controlling on the courts but constitute a body of experience and informed judgment to which the courts and litigants may properly resort for guidance.[96] The weight to be given the administrator's rulings is dependent on the thoroughness evidenced in their consideration, the validity of their reasoning, and their consistency with earlier and later pronouncements.[97] The administrator's interpretation of the statute is controlling as against that of subordinate officials.[98]

Principal office. The Fair Labor Standards Act § 4 (c), 29 U.S.C.A. § 204 (c), provides that the principal office of the administrator shall be in the District of Columbia, but he or his duly authorized representative may exercise any or all of his powers in any place; the function of such provision is to permit the administrator and his representatives to exercise, either within or without the District of Columbia, such powers as he possesses.[99]

Conduct of litigation. Under the Fair Labor Standards Act § 4 (b), 29 U.S.C.A. § 204 (b), providing that attorneys for the administrator may appear for and represent the administrator in any litigation, but all such litigation shall be subject to the control of the attorney general, it was the intention of congress to place ultimate responsibility for legal actions in the department of justice,[1] but the attorney general's participation in litigation by the administrator is permissive and not mandatory,[2] and the petition in the administrator's action need not show on its face that the attorney general has authorized the action, and the attorney general need not appear as one of the attorneys of record or actually and in person or by one of his assistants direct the litigation.[3]

§ 151(31). —— Investigations and Inspections; Subpœnas

The Fair Labor Standards Act authorizes the administrator to investigate the wages, hours, and other conditions of employment in any industry subject to the act, and to conduct investigations in aid of the enforcement of the act; and he has power in a proper case to issue a subpoena duces tecum requiring the production of books and records of an employer, but the enforcement of the subpoena generally rests in the legal discretion of the court.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 11 (a), 29 U.S.C.A. § 211 (a), authorizes the administrator or his designated representatives to investigate the wages, hours, and other conditions and practices of employment in any industry subject to the act,[4] and to conduct investigations which he may deem necessary to determine whether any person has violated any provision of the act, or which may aid in the enforcement of the act.[5] The administrator's investigative function, in searching out violations

Official option

The power conferred on the attorney general under the provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act stating that all litigation in which the administrator is involved shall be subject to the direction and control of the attorney general is permissive and not mandatory, and the manner and extent of his participation are wholly a matter of his official option, as against contention that all litigation under the act must be instituted by the attorney general.—Cudahy Packing Co. v. Fleming, C.C.A.Minn., 122 F.2d 1005, reversed on other grounds Cudahy Packing Co. v. Holland, 62 S.Ct. 803, 315 U.S. 785, 86 L.Ed. 1191.

3. U.S.—Fleming v. Cudahy Packing Co., D.C.Cal., 41 F.Supp. 910.

Order to show cause

The attorney general's consent was not necessary to the filing of petition by wage and hour administrator for an order directing an employer to show cause why an order should not issue requiring employer to produce records as required by a subpoena duces tecum issued under administrator's authority in investigations regarding alleged violations of Fair Labor Standards Act.—Fleming v. Cudahy Packing Co., supra.

A letter from the attorney general to the administrator stating that the legal staffs of the latter's administration would handle his legal work, including litigation of a civil character, with agreement that notice would be given to the attorney general in any case involving an issue of constitutionality was not intended to prevent the administrator from instituting through his own legal staff a proceeding for an order to enforce compliance by an employer with a subpoena duces tecum issued under the Fair Labor Standards Act, and the district court did not lack jurisdiction of the proceeding because the attorney general did not file the application.—Cudahy Packing Co. v. Fleming, C.C.A.Minn., 122 F.2d 1005, reversed on other grounds Cudahy Packing Co. v. Holland, 62 S.Ct. 803, 315 U.S. 785, 86 L.Ed. 1191.

General industry

Under Fair Labor Standards Act provision that Administrator may investigate and gather data regarding wages, hours, and other conditions of employment in any "industry" subject to the act, the quoted word means the general industry as distinguished from a particular employer.—Walling v. Daily Press, D. C.Va., 58 F.Supp. 792.

Presupposition

The power of administrator under Fair Labor Standards Act to investigate conditions of employment in any industry subject to act presupposes that industry is subject to act, but in investigating conditions to determine whether any person has violated act or to aid in enforcement of act, there is no presupposition that employer is subject to act. —Oklahoma Press Pub. Co. v. Walling, C.C.A.Okl., 147 F.2d 658, affirmed 66 S.Ct. 494, 327 U.S. 186, 90 L. Ed. 614, 166 A.L.R. 531.

West Virginia Pulp & Paper Co., D.C.S.C., 2 F.R.D. 416.

Scope of powers

(1) The intended scope of powers of administrator under section of Fair Labor Standards Act giving him a plenary power to make any investigation which may aid in the enforcement of provisions of the act, must be determined from a reading of the section in conjunction with and subordinately to what congress has declared to be the purpose and policy of the act.—Walling v. Benson, C.C.A.Mo., 137 F.2d 501, 149 A. L.R. 186, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 206, 320 U.S. 791, 88 L.Ed. 476.

(2) "A logical line divides the two powers of investigation. The first power is apparently intended largely for statistical and informational purposes. Its object is knowledge, like that of much of the data gathered under the census, not law enforcement. It is, therefore, addressed to an 'industry' and not to an 'employer.' The second power is designed to facilitate the enforcement of a law which necessarily requires on part of the government an intimate acquaintance with working conditions, wages and hours of employment in individual establishments. The power granted is as broad as the need."—Application of Holland, D.C.N.Y., 44 F.Supp. 601, 602, affirmed C.C.A., Walling v. Standard Dredging Corporation, 132 F.2d 322, certiorari denied Standard Dredging Corporation v. Walling, 63 S.Ct. 1318, 319 U.S. 761, 87 L.Ed. 1712, rehearing denied 64 S.Ct. 29, 320 U.S. 810, 88 L.Ed. 489.

Partial examination

Where administrator had made partial examination of employer's books on employer's premises and thereafter right to further inspection was denied, such partial examination did not preclude administrator from making such further examination as was reasonably necessary to carry out purpose of Fair Labor Standards Act and compelling production of books by subpœna duces tecum.—Walling v. W. G. Golebiewski, Inc.,

with a view to securing enforcement of the act, is essentially the same as the function of a grand jury or a court in issuing pretrial orders for the discovery of evidence, and is governed by the same limitations, which are that the administrator shall not act arbitrarily or in excess of his statutory authority; but this does not mean that his inquiry must be limited by forecasts of the probable result of the investigation.[6] The administrator generally has the right to look first into either the question whether the employer is covered by the act or into the question of violation or into both questions concurrently.[7] The administrator's right of investigation is subject to judicial supervision,[8] and persons from whom he seeks relevant information are not required to submit to his demand if it is unreasonable or overreaches his authority.[9]

It is provided by § 9 of the act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 209, that for the purpose of any hearing or investigation under the act the administrator and the industry committees shall have the same power with respect to procuring the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents as are conferred by the Federal Trade Commission Act §§ 9, 10, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 49, 50.[10] Under such provision, the administrator generally has power, in a proper case, to issue a subpoena duces tecum requiring the production of books and records of an employer,[11] but such power of the administrator may not be delegated to subordinates.[12] In the case of refusal to obey the administrator's subpoena, issued according to the statute's authorization, he may have the aid of the federal district court in enforcing it.[13] Although the administrator has the

Equity jurisdiction

The extent of equity jurisdiction of federal district court to correct what citizens say are unlawful acts of United States department of labor or its subordinates appointed under Fair Labor Standards Act can be determined when application for such relief is properly made and jurisdiction of the officers intended to be affected by such equitable relief has been properly obtained.—Fleming v. Burden on employer

In proceeding by administrator for enforcement of subpoena requiring employers to produce specified records to enable administrator to determine questions of coverage and violation of Fair Labor Standards Act, employers had burden of establishing reasons for not enforcing the subpoena in order to make appropriate defense.—Oklahoma Press Pub. Co. v. Walling, supra.

Absence of seal

A subpoena duces tecum which was served on employer to require it to produce records, in connection with an investigation of the employer under the Fair Labor Standards Act was not invalid because of fact that the official seal of the United States department of labor was not placed on the subpoena.—Fleming v. Lowell Sun Co., 36 F.Supp. 320, vacated on other grounds C.C.A., Lowell Sun Co. v. Fleming, 120 F.2d 213, affirmed Holland v. Lowell Sun Co., 62 S.Ct. 793, 315 U.S. 784, 86 L.Ed. 1190.

Power not implied

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, authority in regional director of wage and hour division of department of labor to issue subpœna duces tecum cannot be implied from delegated authority to investigate.—Cudahy Packing Co. of Louisiana v. Holland, La., 62 S.Ct. 651, 315 U.S. 357, 86 L.Ed. 895.

initial discretion in the issuance of a subpoena which, if used impartially for statutory purposes, will be upheld by the court,[14] the enforcement of the subpoena generally rests in the legal discretion of the court,[15] and it has been held that the court must apply any constitutional limitations on the scope of the subpoena, which may involve the place at which the evidence is to be introduced, and the relevance of the evidence sought.[16] However, the administrator's subpoena and examination of witnesses and documents are not those of the federal court.[17]

In determining whether a subpoena will be enforced, it is generally sufficient that the investigation is for a lawfully authorized purpose, that the documents sought to be produced are specified, and that they are adequate, but not excessive, for the purposes of the relevant inquiry,[18] and it is not necessary that a specific charge or complaint of violation of law be pending or that the order be made pursuant to a complaint or violation.[19] The administrator, rather than the court, has authority, in the first instance, to determine the question of coverage in the preliminary investigation of possibly existing violations, and in doing so to exercise his subpoena power for securing evidence on that ques-

Jurisdiction

Where a subpoena duces tecum was issued under wage and hour administrator's direction ordering an employer to produce records for examination in investigations regarding alleged violations of Fair Labor Standards Act, and administrator's petition in proceedings to compel employer to produce records alleged that employer had refused to comply with subpoena, District Court has jurisdiction as against contention that mandamus was proper remedy. —Fleming v. Cudahy Packing Co., D.C.Cal., 41 F.Supp. 910.

The only purpose of a hearing before District Court on application of administrator for an order directing employer to appear before administrator or his representative and produce documentary evidence and give testimony as required by subpoena duces tecum issued by administrator for purpose of determining whether there is a violation of Fair Labor Standards Act is to obtain an order the disobedience of which would place employer in contempt of district court's authority.—Walling v. Detweiler Bros., D.C.Idaho, 58 F. Supp. 201, affirmed, C.C.A., Detweiler Bros. v. Walling, 157 F.2d 841.

By whom application made

Application to district court for order requiring respondent to appear and show cause why it should not appear and produce books and records in accordance with subpœna could be made by administrator, notwithstanding provisions of Fair Labor Standards Act respecting participation by attorney general in litigation in which administrator is involved, which were not "mandatory" but "permissive".—Lowell Sun Co. v. Fleming, C.C.A.Mass., 120 F.2d 213, affirmed Holland v. Lowell Sun Co., 62 S.Ct. 793, 315 U.S. 784, 86 L.Ed. 1190.

Petition held sufficient

Petition for order to enforce subpoena duces tecum has been upheld as against alleged defects of lack of verification, absence of certificate showing authority of notary public to take affidavit of verification, failure to make a return of proceedings theretofore had before administrator, on that witness fees were not paid when subpœna was served, that subpoena was not directed to particular officer served, and characterization as civil action of order to show cause why subpœna should not be enforced.—Walling v. W. G. Golebiewski, Inc., D.C.N.Y., 47 F. Supp. 448, affirmed C.C.A., 142 F.2d 1015.

Motive

An employer could not contend on appeal from an order requiring employer to comply with a subpœna duces tecum issued under the Fair Labor Standards Act, that the district court erred in refusing to give consideration to its allegation concerning the purpose in issuing the subpœna and in seeking a compliance order, since the motive of an administrative officer in undertaking lawful action within the sphere of his valid powers and duties cannot be made the subject of judicial inquiry. —Cudahy Packing Co. v. Fleming, C.C.A.Minn., 122 F.2d 1005, reversed on other grounds Cudahy Packing Co. v. Holland, 62 S.Ct. 803, 315 U.S. 785, 86 L.Ed. 1191.

tion, by seeking production of the employer's relevant books, records, and papers.[20] It is only required that the administrator satisfy the court of the existence of reasonable ground for belief that the industry being investigated is subject to the act,[21] and he need not show, as a condition to obtaining an order to enforce the subpoena, that the employer is within the coverage of the act.[22] In other words, the employer is not entitled to an adjudication that he is covered by the act as a prerequisite to enforcement of the subpoena, but the court need only have assurance that it is not giving judicial sanction to unwarranted and arbitrary action, and that reasonable ground exists for the investigation.[23]

Where an industry is subject to the act, the administrator is entitled to enforce a subpoena in aid of an investigation notwithstanding many of the employees are claimed to be exempt from provisions as to minimum wages and overtime pay,[24] and he may demand the production of the records of all of the employees, both nonexempt and exempt.[25] Also, where an employer engaged in operating several plants contends that only a part of those plants is subject to the act, the administrator has the right to inspect the shipment records of all of the plants in order to determine the scope of the operations of each and the relationship among them.[26]

It has been held, however, that the administrator is not entitled to an order for the enforcement of an investigatory subpoena as to any industry which he knows is wholly outside the scope of the coverage of the act, that is, which he has no "reasonable ground" to believe is subject to the act.[27] In this connection "reasonable ground" means that which would be equivalent relatively, in the nature and circumstances of the situation, to what in other legal situations is referred to as "probable cause,"[28] and what the extent of the showing of "reasonable ground" should be in an individual case must be left to the district court's discretion.[29] It has also been held that the purpose of evidence sought by the subpoena should be to aid in enforcement of the act, and that the scope of the subpoena should encompass only that purpose.[30] A subpoena issued and enforced according to law is not objectionable on the ground that it would subject the employer to inconvenience, expense, and harassment,[31] or

§ 151(32). —— Fixing of Minimum Wage by Wage Order

a. In general
b. Requisites and sufficiency of wage order
c. Subsidiary terms and conditions
d. Judicial review

a. In General

The Fair Labor Standards Act provides an administrative procedure for establishing a minimum wage in particular industries greater than that generally prescribed; such increase over the statutory minimum may be fixed for any industry subject to the act by the administrator in collaboration with an industry committee appointed by him, after hearings by the committee and by the administrator, and after a consideration of economic conditions, competitive conditions, and the possible curtailment of employment.

The Fair Labor Standards Act § 8, 29 U.S.C.A. § 208, provides an administrative procedure for establishing a minimum wage in particular industries greater than that prescribed by § 6 of the act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 206, but not in excess of a specified amount per hour, such increase over the statutory minimum to be fixed for any industry subject to the act by the administrator in collaboration with an industry committee.[33] The statute does not contemplate that wage orders for all industries or all parts of an industry shall go into practice simultaneously, but contemplates rather that the administrator may appoint a committee to deliberate on a particular section of an industry, an industry, or a group of industries.[34]

As part of the administrative procedure for fixing wage rates in particular industries greater than that prescribed by the act, the statute authorizes the appointment of industry committees composed of equal numbers of representatives of the public, of the employers, and of the employees in the industry, selected with due regard to geographical considerations,[35] but the act lays down no standards for subcommittees.[36] Mathematical geographic apportionment of the committee is not required, but the administrator has discretion in selecting, with the purposes of the act in mind, a committee on which the geographically distributed interests of the industry shall be fairly represented.[37] An order appointing an industry committee is not void because of changes in the definition of the industry made after the appointment.[38]

Under the statutory procedure, an industry committee acts as an investigating body with the duty to report its recommendations as to the minimum wage to the administrator.[39] The statute does not require any particular method of procuring evidence or any set type of procedure before the committee;[40] and the committee is not required to conduct

Employers engaged in production

Administrator may appoint to an industry committee an employer engaged in the production of goods for commerce along with employers engaged in interstate commerce, and hence the application of Fair Labor Standards Act to employers engaged in the production of goods for commerce is not improper on the ground that such employers may not be represented on industry committees having the power to fix rate of wages.—Fleming v. Arsenal Bldg. Corporation, C.C.A.N.Y., 125 F.2d 278, affirmed Arsenal Bldg. Corporation v. Walling, 62 S.Ct. 1116, 316 U.S. 517, 86 L.Ed. 1638.

Representation of industry as a whole

Where sixteen of forty-eight members on industry committee appointed by administrator represented employers, and the sixteen were severally engaged in twelve of the twenty-five separate apparel industries in the groups, the industry as a whole was represented, and absence of infants' and children's wear industry representative on the committee did not violate requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act.—Andree & Seedman v. Administrator of Wage and Hour Division of U. S. Department of Labor, 122 F.2d 634, 74 App.D.C. 240.

Abuse of discretion not shown

Where three members of industry committee for fixing wages and hours in southern textile mills, out of seven representing the public, four members out of seven representing employers, and two members out of seven representing employees, were from southern states, abuse of discretion was not shown under statute requiring due regard to be given to geographical regions in appointing members.—Opp Cotton Mills v. a quasi-judicial proceeding on notice and hearing, since its only function is to investigate on the basis of data which the administrator may submit, and which the committee may procure for itself, and to report its recommendations with respect to the minimum wage.[41] A final definition of the industry need not be made before the committee meets, and the definition may be amended while the matter is pending before the committee, as long as the report of the committee is based on the amended definition.[42]

The industry committee's report is the basis of proceedings before the administrator which are judicial in character, with provisions for notice and full hearing.[43] It is this hearing which has primary significance in ascertaining whether the rudiments of a proper procedure were followed, and it is the evidence adduced at such hearing that must support the findings, and it is the record made before the administrator that is open to judicial scrutiny.[44] On the hearing the industry committee may advocate approval of its own report,[45] and members of the staff of the wage and hour division may give testimony.[46] The administrator must admit all evidence offered on relevant items,[47] and the technical rules for exclusion of evidence applicable in jury trials do not apply.[48]

The issues to be determined by the administrator on the hearing are whether the recommendations of the committee are made in accordance with law, whether they are supported by the evidence adduced at the hearing, and, taking into consideration the same factors as are required to be considered by the industry, whether they will carry out the purposes of the statute.[49] The statute requires a consideration of economic conditions, competitive conditions, and the possible curtailment of employment as a basis for a wage order fixing wage rates for an industry,[50] and the committee and the administrator are also required, as prerequisites of fixing

Substitute members

In determining validity of wage order made by Administrator on recommendation of industry committee, it was immaterial that substitutes were appointed for two members of committee in course of its deliberations, where it did not appear that substitutes did not consider the evidence taken and the proceedings had before their appointment to the committee.—Opp Cotton Mills v. Scope of review

The command of provision of Fair Labor Standards Act that Administrator, as prerequisite to a wage order, find that recommendations of industry committee are made in accordance with law, does not extend to a review of evidence at hearing before committee for investigation of mental processes by which committee members reached their conclusion to recommend the minimum wage, or extend beyond inquiry on evidence before administrator whether requirement of act and rules of administrator as to composition of committee, definition of industry, and actions required to be taken by committee have been observed.—Opp Cotton Mills v. Administrative judgment

The weight to be given competitive conditions and other relevant factors which justify wage differentials is a matter of administrative judgment.—Southern Garment Mfrs. Ass'n v. Fleming, 122 F.2d 622, 74 App.D.C. 228.

Ability to bear increase

In fixing the minimum wage, the ultimate determination to be made by the industry committee and the administrator is the effect of the rate on curtailment of employment in the industry, rather than the economic ability of the industry to bear the increase.—Columbus & G. Ry. Co. v. Administrator of Wage and Hour Division, U. S. Department of Labor, C.C.A.5, 126 F.2d 136.

Textile industry

(1) Administrator had duty to con-

classifications of rates within any industry, to determine that it will not give a competitive advantage to any group in the industry and that the prescribed wage will not substantially curtail employment in each classification.[51] The word "industry," in this connection, means the industry on a nation-wide geographical basis,[52] and the administrator need not establish regional differentials based on competitive conditions.[53]

The statute does not require a finding on each supposititious factor bearing on conditions pertinent to the wage determination,[54] and the administrator need not specifically recite that he has considered every conceivable relevant item and make a specific finding thereon.[55] Where a committee appointed to cover a broad industry makes numerous recommendations as to classifications and wages, the administrator need not accept the entire report but may reject the proposed wage classification as to a narrow branch of the industry.[56]

b. Requisites and Sufficiency of Wage Order

Where the administrator has complied with statutory requirements, he may promulgate a wage order fixing wages for an industry, and such orders generally have the force and effect of a legislative act, are subject to the same tests as to their validity, and are governed by the same rules of construction. Wage orders must define the industries and classifications therein to which they apply.

Where the administrator has acted within the general sphere of his delegated powers and has complied with the processes necessary for their exercise, he may promulgate a wage order fixing wages for an industry, within the limits permitted by the act, and such wage orders, for all civil purposes, have the force and effect of a legislative act, are subject to the same tests as to their validity, and are governed by the same rules of construction.[57] The fact that individual members of an industry are so situated economically as to be unable to pay the wage rate fixed by the administrator is no reason for holding the administrator's order invalid unless the position of such members in the industry is so dominating that their failure to survive would seriously injure the industry and those employed in it by throwing a considerable number of them out of employment.[58]

Under Fair Labor Standards Act § 8 (f), 29 U.S.C.A. § 208 (f), it is required that wage orders promulgated by the administrator shall define the industries and classifications therein to which they apply,[59] but the administrator need not enumerate in his definition every specific product which the order was designed to cover.[60] The definition is only required to outline with reasonable clarity the general limits of the industry sought to be covered,[61] and where this has been done, and general opportunity for hearing on notice has been duly afforded, there is no injustice in administratively

sider competitive condition between cotton and wool manufacturers in making a definition of the woolen industry which resulted in placing some types of yarn under a thirty-two and one-half cent minimum and other similar yarns under a thirty-six cent minimum wage, and some mixed fabrics under a thirty-two and one-half cent wage and others under a thirty-six cent wage, even though separate committees had been appointed for the woolen and textile industries.—National Ass'n of Wool Manufacturers v. Fleming, 122 F.2d 617, 74 App.D.C. 223.

(2) Order of administrator defining the textile industry was not void because administrator placed the woolen industry in a different industry under a different committee, where, in defining the textile industry, administrator took into account competitive interrelationship of fabrics included and interchangeability of looms employed in producing them, and in excluding the woolen industry he took accunt of its competitive relationships with products included and different nature of establishments, labor forces and wage structures associated with the two types of product.—Opp Cotton Mills v. Administrator of Wage and Hour Division of Department of Labor, 61 S.Ct. 524, 312 U.S. 126, 657, 85 L.Ed. 624.

Freight differentials

The fact that discrimination exists against a particular geographical region because of freight differentials does not require that the differential be equalized by a classification of wage rates.—Opp Cotton Mills v. applying the order to any product which, by sound implication and natural interpretation, falls within the boundaries that have been set and which has not been specifically excepted.[62] As far as the definition of an industry is open to attack, it is on the record made before the administrator.[63]

Generally the inclusion of a particular business or branch of business within a certain classification is a matter within the administrator's discretion,[64] and it has been held that the inclusion by the administrator of a given product in one industry or another, where both are subject to the act, principally concerns convenience in administering the act, since provisions for classification with appropriate wage differentials afford ample opportunity for fixing an appropriate wage with respect to any product, whether it is placed in one industry or another.[65] The fact that a particular manufacturer is ordinarily considered as within a certain industry imposes no duty on the administrator to adopt such classification instead of classifying such manufacturer within another industry,[66] and the fact that some manufacturers within an industry as defined by a wage order require a higher degree of skill in their production or sell for substantially higher prices than another manufacturer within the same industry does not preclude the administrator's comprehensive interpretation of such classification.[67] The fact that a particular employer who manufactures products within a classification established by a wage order also manufactures other products not within the classification does not remove its operations with respect to the covered products from the classification.[68]

Interpretive rulings of wage orders promulgated in accordance with the act are entitled to great weight,[69] and, where the interpretation which the administrator has given a wage order embraces the production of particular articles, the court should make that effective unless it appears that the administrator's action was arbitrary.[70]

c. Subsidiary Terms and Conditions

The Fair Labor Standards Act authorizes the administrator to include in a wage order such terms and conditions as he finds necessary to carry out the purposes of such order, to prevent the circumvention or evasion thereof, and to safeguard the minimum wage rates established therein.

A provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act § 8 (f), 29 U.S.C.A. § 208 (f), authorizes the administrator to include in a wage order such terms and conditions as the administrator finds necessary to carry out the purposes of such orders, to prevent the circumvention or evasion thereof, and to safeguard the minimum wage rates established therein.[71] The administrator's function in this respect is to facili-

Matters considered

The interpretation of a wage order by administrator must be given due weight which will in particular case depend on thoroughness evident in its consideration, validity of its reasoning, its consistency with earlier and later pronouncements, etc.—Walling v. Brooklyn Braid Co., C.C. A.N.Y., 152 F.2d 938.

"Statutory" or "committee" wages

Under provision of Fair Labor Standards Act directing administrator to include in wage orders such terms and conditions as he finds necessary to carry out the purposes of such orders, administrator was not without power on theory that authority to prescribe terms and conditions applied only to industry committee and not to statutory wages and would expire seven years from effective date of the provision, since authority conferred by the provision must be read as of 1938 when provision took effect and power to prescribe committee wages or to include terms and conditions in order did not expire altogether at end of seven years, and case involved only committee wages.—Gemsco, Inc., v. Walling, 65 S.Ct. 605, 324 U.S. 244, 89 L.Ed. 921—Maretzo v. Walling, 65 S.Ct. 605, 324 U.S. 244, 89 L.Ed. 921—Guiseppi v. Walling, 65 S.Ct. 605, 324 U.S. 244, 89 L.Ed. 921.

Incidental conditions

A wage order direction to pay wages not less than those fixed by the administrator includes the requirement that employers observe incidental conditions lawfully included to safeguard rates and prevent their circumvention or evasion.

tate the enforcement of the minimum wage rather than to achieve other objects,[72] but he is not forbidden to take the only measures which would be effective to protect the minimum wage merely because other social or economic consequences necessarily would follow.[73] So the administrator may provide in a wage order for workers in a certain industry for the prohibition of home work, with limited exceptions, in order to make effective the minimum wage prescribed for the industry.[74] A provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act that no wage order issued under the statute shall remain in effect after seven years from the effective date of the minimum wage provision does not have the effect of causing the expiration of provisions of wage orders other than as to minimum wages which were imposed to make effective the fixation of the wage rate for a particular industry.[75]

d. Judicial Review

Review of the administrator's order fixing a minimum wage for an industry is had by petition to the circuit court of appeals on the record made before the administrator, but the review is limited to questions of law, and findings of fact by the administrator when supported by substantial evidence are conclusive.

Under Fair Labor Standards Act, § 10, 29 U.S.C.A. § 210, review of the administrator's order fixing a minimum wage for an industry is had by petition to the circuit court of appeals on the record made before the administrator.[76] Accordingly, where there has been a sufficiently clear definition of an industry in a wage order by the administrator and notice and opportunity for hearing have been duly given, any question of unreasonableness or arbitrariness in connection with issuance of the wage order may be tested judicially only by a petition for review in the proper circuit court of appeals,[77] and not by a proceeding of any other kind.[78] Under the statute review of the administrator's order by the courts is limited to questions of law, and findings of fact by the administrator when supported by substantial evidence are conclusive.[79] The weight to be given to particular evidence and the inferences to be drawn from it are for the administrator and not the courts,[80] and, where evidence was received by the administrator without objection, the admission of such evidence may not be attacked in the courts.[81]

The definition of an industry made by the administrator in a wage order will not be lightly dis-

Statutory intent

Mention of child labor in Fair Labor Standards Act does not warrant inference, from failure expressly to mention home work, that home work was not included within general language which comprehends all necessary means to achieve the primary objects of the act, but the opposite conclusion must be drawn in view of administrator's uncontested findings concerning effect of home work in producing hidden child labor at substandard wages, thus circumventing the act in two of its primary objects.—Gemsco, Inc., v. Walling, 65 S.Ct. 605, 324 U.S. 244, 89 L.Ed. 921—Maretzo v. Walling, 65 S.Ct. 605, 324 U.S. 244, 89 L.Ed. 921—Guiseppi v. Walling, 65 S.Ct. 605, 324 U.S. 244, 89 L.Ed. 921.

A definition of the woolen industry, in respect of yarns and fabrics, made by the administrator of the wage and hour division, department of labor, was an inextricable part of wage order applying to the woolen industry and was judicially reviewable.—National Ass'n of Wool Manufacturers v. Inferences from evidence

Where finding of the administrator was compatible with certain inferences to be drawn from the evidence, employers could not support their case on review by merely showing another inference, without having guarded themselves against the finding by originally submitting specific evidence thereon.—National Ass'n of Wool Manufacturers v. turbed,[82] and it has been held that a court should hesitate long before nullifying a classification within an industry after approval thereof by the administrator for the purpose of a wage order.[83] If some supposititious relevant item is overlooked by the interested parties, the committee, and the administrator, the wage order will not for that reason be held invalid on judicial review.[84]

State minimum wage laws. Orders of an administrative body fixing minimum wages under state minimum wage laws have been held subject to judicial inquiry.[85]

§ 151(33). Books, Records, and Reports

The Fair Labor Standards Act requires employers subject to the act to make, keep, and preserve employment records, and to make such reports therefrom to the administrator as he may prescribe, and such duty may not be delegated or avoided by reason of difficulty of compliance.

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act § 11 (c), 29 U.S.C.A. § 211 (c), every employer subject to the act may be required to keep and preserve records of the persons employed by him and of the wages, hours, and other conditions and practices of employment maintained by him, and to make such reports therefrom to the administrator as he may prescribe as necessary or appropriate for the enforcement of the statute or the regulations or orders thereunder.[86] Where some of the employees of a business are within the coverage of the act, the employer is required to keep adequate records as to all of its employees as required by the act and regulations promulgated thereunder,[87] but it has been held that the requirement as to the keeping of records does not apply to employers exempted from the provisions of the act with respect to payment of minimum wages and overtime pay for work in excess of the specified number of hours,[88] and an employer does not violate the provisions of the act relating to records where he has no employee in respect of whom records are required to be made, kept, and preserved.[89] An employer is not excused from making, keeping, and preserving necessary employment records because it may be difficult or commercially impractical to do so.[90]

Under the statute the administrator has large power over the question of records, including accounting practices,[91] and if the administrator should find that any system of accounting practically interferes with the work of the act he may promulgate a regulation correcting the situation.[92] So the administrator may require an employer to keep records of its home workers and of wages, hours, and other conditions and practices of employment maintained by it,[93] and he may require that the records plainly and objectively show the hours worked and the wages due even though employees are paid on a piecework basis.[94] The administrator is authorized to require employers to keep their records on a weekly rather than on a semi-monthly basis.[95]

liable to criminal prosecution, as discussed infra § 151 (34). An employer subject to the provisions of the act may not escape his duty to make, keep, and preserve necessary employment records by delegating such duty to another,[97] and he is not relieved of this duty because the extent of his business may preclude his personal supervision and compel reliance on subordinates.[98] Ordinarily it is the duty of the employer, and not of the employee, to keep and produce records of hours worked by the employee,[99] but it has been held that where an employer relies in good faith on employees to keep and report their own time and the employer uses the record so made as the record of time required by the administrator's regulations, and where neither the employer nor his agents do or say anything to cause employees to keep an incorrect record, the employer does not violate the provisions of the act requiring the keeping of proper records.[1]

It has been held that an officer of a company whose duties are executive or supervisory, whose hours of work are not regulated or controlled, and whose compensation is not dependent on any measure of time actually devoted to his duties, is not an employee for whom the employer must keep records of hours worked and wages paid under a state minimum wage act.[2]

§ 151(34). Penalties for Violation

a. Civil liability
b. Criminal liability

a. Civil Liability

An employer who violates the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act relating to minimum wages and overtime pay is liable to the employee affected in the amount of his unpaid wages. Where an employer fails to pay minimum wages or overtime compensation in accordance with the requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act, he is liable under the act for an additional equal amount as liquidated damages, whether or not the employee is compelled to sue for the wages due, but the court has discretion to deny recovery of liquidated damages if it is shown that the employer acted in good faith in failing to pay statutory wages.

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act § 16 (b), 29 U.S.C.A. § 216 (b), an employer who violates the provisions of the act relating to minimum wages and overtime pay is liable to the employee affected in the amount of his unpaid minimum wages, or his unpaid overtime compensation.[3] The effect of the act is to make an employee subject thereto a creditor of the employer for the wages required by the statute, without regard to any actual attempted agreement as to compensation, and even if payment is made in accordance with an agreement.[4] However, an employee is entitled to recover additional compensation under the act only where the employer violates the provisions of the act as to minimum wages and payment for overtime.[5]

Liquidated damages. Under the Fair Labor Standards Act § 16 (b), 29 U.S.C.A. § 216 (b), any employer who violates the minimum wage or overtime pay provision of the act and is liable to the employee for unpaid minimum wages, or overtime compensation, is also liable for an additional equal amount as liquidated damages,[6] and for a reason-

False records

A company engaged in interstate commerce or production of goods for commerce by failing to keep true records of hours worked each day and each work week by each employee and by making or causing to be made false entries purporting to reflect hours worked each day and each work week by each employee, the regular rate of pay, the regular straight time earnings, and additional overtime earnings of many of its employees, violated Fair Labor Standards Act.—Walling v. able attorney's fee, as discussed infra § 160 (11). The provision constitutes a congressional recognition that failure to pay the wages required by statute may be so detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standard of living and the free flow of commerce that double payment must be made in the event of delay in paying the required wages in order to insure restoration of the worker to that minimum standard of well-being.[7]

In determining the nature of the additional recovery permitted, the terminology used by congress in designating such recovery as "liquidated damages" is entitled to some weight,[8] and it is generally regarded as wages or compensation, not as a penalty or punishment.[9] Nevertheless it is an enforcement provision, not the least effective aspect of such remedy being the possibility that an employer who gambles on evading the act will be liable for payment not only of the wages originally due but all damages equal to the sum left unpaid.[10] The employer's liability for liquidated damages is not conditioned on default at the time suit is begun, and hence the right to recover such damages does not arise only if the employee is compelled to sue for minimum wages due.[11] So the acceptance of tardy payment of wages under the act does not preclude

Validity of allowance

(1) Allowance of liquidated damages for failure to pay building service employees engaged in production of goods for interstate commerce compensation for overtime work at rate prescribed is not an unconstitutional application of provision of act for liquidated damages, notwithstanding uncertainty as to applicability of act to such employees.—Adams v. Obscure damages

The liquidated damage provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act is not penal in its nature but constitutes compensation for retention of a workman's pay which might result in damages too obscure and difficult of proof for estimate other than by liquidated damages.—Brooklyn Sav. Bank v. O'Neil, N.Y., 65 S.Ct. 895, 324 U.S. 697, 89 L.Ed. 1296, rehearing denied 65 S.Ct. 1189, 325 U.S. 893, 89 L.Ed. 2005—Dize v. Remedial statute

The fact that federal Fair Labor Standards Act provides in one section for criminal prosecution of employers violating minimum wage and overtime compensation provisions and in another section for recovery of liquidated damages by civil action does not prevent consideration of statute as remedial, rather than penal, in action to enforce civil remedy.—Newman v. George A. Fuller Co., R.I., 48 A.2d 345.

recovery of the additional amount due as liquidated damages.[12] Payments in some weeks of more than the statutory requirements does not relieve the employer from the obligation to pay liquidated damages for underpayments in other weeks.[13]

Under the provisions of the Portal-to-Portal Act § 11, 29 U.S.C.A. § 260, the court is given discretion as to the award of liquidated damages provided for by the Fair Labor Standards Act if the employer shows to the satisfaction of the court that he was acting in good faith and had reasonable grounds to believe that he was not violating the statute.[14] Prior to such statute it was held that the provision for liquidated damages was mandatory on the court,[15] regardless of the employer's good faith and the reasonableness of his attitude in not paying the wages required by the statute,[16] and that the difficulty of the employer in determining whether his employees were covered by the act did not entitle him to avoid liability for liquidated damages because of the failure to pay statutory overtime.[17]

Statutory intent
The liquidated damages provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act is mandatory and not discretionary, since the use of the word "wilful" in the provision defining criminal liability under the act and its omission in the liquidated damages provision defining civil liability indicates that the employer's good faith is immaterial under the liquidated damages provision.—Missel v. Overnight Motor Transp. Co., C.C.A.Md., 126 F.2d 98, affirmed 62 S.Ct. 1216, 316 U.S. 572, 86 L.Ed. 1682, rehearing denied 63 S.Ct. 76, 317 U.S. 706, 87 L. Ed. 563.

Findings of wage and hour division of United States department of labor as to amounts due employees under minimum wage regulation promulgated pursuant to Fair Labor Standards Act are merely ministerial acts, not judicial pronouncements foreclosing court from awarding liquidated damages and fixing reasonable counsel fee in employees' pending action therefor.—Asaro v. Decision of commission
It has been held, however, that where act excluded from its maximum hour provisions employees for whom Interstate Commerce Commission had statutory power to establish maximum hours and contract motor common carrier had violated the act prior and subsequent to commission's decision determining generally which employees were subject to its jurisdiction, the employees were not entitled to penalties before the decision of the commission, but were entitled to double damages and attorney's fees after that time where to expect the employer to construe the statutes would violate the due process of law clause, and the carriers had made laborious efforts to find out what the statutes meant.—Anuchick v. Transamerican Freight Lines, D.C.Mich., 46 F.Supp. 861.

b. Criminal Liability

The Fair Labor Standards Act renders it a criminal offense to violate particular provisions of the act.

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act § 16, 29 U.S.C.A. § 216, it is made a criminal offense willfully to violate particular provisions of the act,[18] but the failure to pay liquidated damages is not a crime or misdemeanor.[19] Under a provision prohibiting the transportation or shipment in interstate commerce of goods produced under labor conditions with respect to wages and hours which fail to conform to standards set up by the statute, it is not necessary, in order to constitute a violation of the statute, for any of the defendants to have been personally present during the process of transporting or delivering, if they knowingly caused it to be done by others.[20] The fact that defendant's failure to make payments of wages in accordance with the requirements of the act may have been due to financial inability has been held not to exempt him from prosecution for violations of the act due to such failure.[21]

It is an offense under the statute to fail to keep books and records as required by the act or to make a false statement, report, or record,[22] and an employer who knowingly and intentionally, as distinguished from accidentally, makes a false record of hours worked by an employee is guilty of a willful violation of the act even though he may have had no evil motive.[23] The making of false records by the manager of a corporation has been held to be the criminal act of both the corporation and its manager within the penal provisions of the act.[24] Under the Fair Labor Standards Act § 15 (a) (3), 29 U.S.C.A. § 215 (a) (3), it is unlawful for any person to discharge or in any other manner discriminate against any employee because such employee has filed any complaint or instituted or caused to be instituted any proceeding under or related to the statute, or has testified or is about to testify in any such proceeding, or has served or is about to serve on an industry committee.[25] Such provision is directed against "any person" and is not limited to employers.[26]

§ 151(35). Waiver, Estoppel, Release, Settlement, and Accord and Satisfaction

a. Liability for wages and overtime compensation

b. Liability for liquidated damages

a. Liability for Wages and Overtime Compensation

Generally liability for the full compensation required by the Fair Labor Standards Act may not be avoided by waiver, estoppel, release, settlement, or accord and satisfaction; but after an employee's rights have been adjudicated and crystallized into a judgment he may take less than that judgment if he considers it to his advantage to do so.

As a general rule, since the Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, is a statute affected with a public interest, it is against public policy to preclude payment of compensation guaranteed by its terms, because of any agreement, conspiracy, or subterfuge resorted to by employer and employee, either, or both.[27] In the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, an employee may not waive his rights against an employer for the wages prescribed by the act,[28] and he cannot give a valid release of his rights against the employer in consideration of receiving payment of an amount less than that provided by the act,[29] even in the absence of fraud or coercion on the part of the employer,[30] since the rights provided the employee under the act are not his alone, but are affected with a public interest.[31] The sum paid by an employer to secure a release of claims must be applied merely as partial payments of the amount due to employees who were not paid in full.[32]

The fact that an employee was paid the sum provided for by contract and made no claim for additional compensation does not bar his right to the

Arbitration

In action for overtime, damages, and attorney's fees under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, defense pleading an agreement between the parties to settle disputes by arbitration was insufficient, since no private agreement can override the express provisions of the act.—Garrity v. Bagold Corporation, 42 N.Y.S. 2d 257, 180 Misc. 120, modified on other grounds 46 N.Y.S.2d 637, 267 App. Div. 353.

Rebates

The requirement of the act for payment of minimum wages and overtime cannot be rebated by agreement between employer and employee, or by any system of bookkeeping designed for that purpose.—Garchell v. Kantar, D.C.Minn., 56 F. Supp. 866, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., 150 F.2d 47.

Time of agreement

An employee is not bound by any agreement to accept less than the prescribed minimum wage whether such agreement is made before or after the wage has been earned and has become due, regardless of the existence of an honest dispute as to whether the act is applicable to the employee.—Cassese v. Manufacturers Trust Co., 46 N.Y.S.2d 621, 182 Misc. 344.

Increase of salary

In action for overtime compensation and liquidated damages under Fair Labor Standards Act where plaintiff-employee, in connection with a summary of his claim, testified that he figured the amount of overtime pay all the way through on basis of salary he was receiving during first of period involved and it appeared that employee had been uncertain as to when his salary had been increased, employee did not, by his testimony, intend to waive any part of his claim.—Keen v. Inducement for union contract

Manufacturers Trust Co., 46 N.Y.S.2d 621, 182 Misc. 344.

(2) A settlement between employers and bargaining agent for employees, providing for payment of increased wages in the future as a settlement of all claims for compensation and damages under Fair Labor Standards Act, was not a valid agreement where it was not shown how much of the increased wage scale was for payment of compensation due and how much may have resulted from economic pressure by the bargaining agent, or how much came naturally on a rising wage scale market.—Watkins v. Hudson Coal Co., C.C.A.Pa., 151 F.2d 311, certiorari denied 66 S.Ct. 522, 327 U.S. 777, 90 L.Ed. 1005, rehearing denied 66 S.Ct. 701, 327 U.S. 816, 90 L.Ed. 1039.

minimum compensation provided for by the act[33] and to payment for overtime.[34] An employee may not, as a matter of law, by failing to report and collect for overtime hours, waive his right to overtime pay, if entitled thereto,[35] and an employee is entitled to recover for overtime worked by him regardless of any agreement or conspiracy between employer and employee to make a false record with reference to the number of hours worked.[36] Payment of less than the statutory wages due may not be sustained on the theory of an account stated.[37]

As a general rule, in the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, there can be no valid compromise or settlement which would result in payment of less than the amount required by statute,[38] at least in the absence of a bona fide dispute as to the amount of the liability.[39] The existence of a controversy as to coverage of the act does not validate a compromise for less than the amount due under the act,[40] and a dispute as to the constitutionality of the act or its application to certain employees has been held merely a dispute concerning questions of law, with respect to validity of a settlement agreement.[41] So the good faith of the employer in believing that the employment was not covered by the act does not afford a basis for a good-faith dispute between the parties so as to support an agreement of accord and satisfaction.[42]

In order to constitute a valid compromise settlement of a dispute between employer and employee as to the number of hours worked by the employee, so as to bar action for unpaid overtime wages, the facts respecting the settlement must be clear cut and definite, there must be a final meeting of the minds on the compromise, with full understanding of the dispute and the effect of the compromise, the settlement must be as to the number of hours worked, and the full benefits provided for by the act based on the hours so determined must flow from such settlement.[43] Such a settlement may not be based

Proof of claim
By failing to report and collect for overtime hours, an employee did not as a matter of law waive his right to overtime pay under Fair Labor Standards Act, if entitled thereto, but court would consider such failure in determining weight of employee's testimony on issue respecting whether employee had made satisfactory proof of claim for overtime.—Sauls v. Payment of wages in future
Where the identity of employees, seeking overtime wages and damages was established, their employment was concededly covered by the act, the hours or terms on which they worked were not subject to serious dispute, and amount due under the act could be mathematically calculated, a purported settlement previously made by which employers agreed to pay certain wages in the future was not such a settlement as was valid under the act.—Watkins v. Hudson Coal Co., C.C.A.Pa., 151 F. 2d 311, certiorari denied 66 S.Ct. 522, 327 U.S. 777, 90 L.Ed. 1005, rehearing denied 66 S.Ct. 701, 327 U.S. 816, 90 L.Ed. 1039.

Approval by judge
Approval of settlement of employees' claims for minimum wages and liquidated damages by supreme court by which employer was appointed a trustee merely constituted judicial sanction for payment of moneys by the trustee, and did not determine validity or binding effect of settlement, so as to render settlement a valid defense to employees' action to recover amount due under the act.—Cassese v. No dispute as to hours
Where there was no dispute between employer and employee as to employee's hours of work and they stipulated as to amount of overtime wages to which he would be entitled, if Fair Labor Standards Act applied to him, his action thereunder for unpaid overtime wages was not barred by any compromise or attempt to compromise between him and defendant employer.—Strand v. on a legal dispute as to whether the employee should be considered to be working during certain hours in which the employee was on duty.[44] It has been held that the wage and hour division is to be considered a party to any arrangements affecting wage payments between the employer and the employee in settlement of liability for overtime.[45]

After an employee has had his full rights under the act adjudicated to a finality and those rights have been crystallized into a judgment, he is at liberty to take less than that judgment if he considers it to his advantage to do so.[46]

Estoppel. As a general rule, liability to an employee for unpaid minimum wages and overtime compensation may not be avoided on the ground of estoppel of the employee to claim payment thereof.[47] So the fact that the employer in reliance on a collective bargaining agreement calculated certain expenses, which could not be immediately changed, does not estop the employee to seek the recovery of unpaid overtime wages not provided for in such agreement.[48] Also the failure of employees to complain to the employer of the failure to compensate them for periods worked as required by the act does not estop them later to assert the right to such compensation,[49] and it has been held that the acceptance of payments of regular and overtime wages does not estop an employee to sue to recover the amount due him when he proves that he actually worked longer hours than those paid for.[50] It has been held, however, that an employee who failed to make claim promptly for overtime compensation is estopped to assert such claim in an action against the employer under the act,[51] and that, where the employee prepared and signed daily work reports showing only a negligible amount of overtime and permitted the employer to act thereon, without any knowledge of the falsity of such reports, the employee is estopped subsequently to assert that such daily reports were incorrect and that he was entitled to additional overtime compensation for hours worked and not shown on the records.[52]

b. Liability for Liquidated Damages

In the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, the right to liquidated damages for failure to make timely payment of compensation required by the act may not validly be waived or released, and may not be compromised or settled for less than the full amount due under the act.

Whether the statutory right to liquidated damages granted under § 1 et seq of the Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 201 et seq, may be waived or released depends on the intention of congress as manifested in the act.[53] In this respect the same policy considerations which forbid the waiver of the right to basic minimum and overtime wages under the act, discussed supra subdivision a of this section, also prohibit waiver of the employee's right to liquidated damages.[54] Accordingly, in the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, it is generally held that the right to liquidated damages for failure to make timely payment of compensation required by the act may not validly be waived or released,[55] and may not be compromised or settled for less than the full amount due under the act.[56] Such a waiver or release does not bar a subsequent action for the statutory liquidated damages, at least in the absence of a bona fide dispute between the parties as to liability,[57] and in this connection a controversy between the parties as to coverage of the act has been held not such a dispute as to permit a valid compromise for less than the full damages due.[58]

In accordance with the foregoing rules, the payment and acceptance of back minimum and overtime wages by an employee does not constitute a valid release or settlement of the employee's claim for an equal amount as liquidated damages, required to be paid under the act.[59] The employer's lia-

Determination of intent

In absence of evidence of specific congressional intent, court must resort to a broader consideration of legislative policy behind liquidated damage provision as evidenced by its legislative history and the provisions in and structure of the act; the elimination from a predecessor bill of a provision prohibiting waiver of provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act does not indicate congressional intent to allow employee to waive his claim to liquidated damages since such interpretation would nullify effectiveness of the act; and the fact that the act does not prohibit an employee from waiving his claim to liquidated damages does not indicate congressional intent that employee may waive such claim because other federal statutes authorizing employees to sue for wages or for damages arising from injuries sustained in course of employment contain specific provisions prohibiting waiver of rights under the acts involved, or provide means by which compromises and settlements can be approved, since congressional policy would be thwarted by permitting such waivers.—Brooklyn Sav. Bank v. O'Neil, N.Y., 65 S.Ct. 895, 324 U.S. 697, 89 L.Ed. 1296, rehearing denied 65 S.Ct. 1189, 325 U.S. 893, 89 L.Ed. 2005—Dize v. Maddrix, N.Y., 65 S.Ct. 895, 324 U.S. 697, 89 L.Ed. 1296—Arsenal Bldg. Corp. v. Greenberg, N.Y., 65 S.Ct. 895, 324 U.S. 697, 89 L.Ed. 1296.

The failure to impose criminal sanctions for violation of liquidated damage provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act or to authorize injunction to prevent its violation does not manifest a difference in congress' attitude toward waiver of employee's right to basic statutory wage as compared with his right to liquidated damages since liquidated damages are collectable as private damages by employee for failure to obey same requirements as to wages which are punished and controlled, as far as the purely public interest is concerned, by criminal sanctions and injunction.—Brooklyn Sav. Bank v. O'Neil, N.Y., 65 S.Ct. 895, 324 U.S. 697, 89 L.Ed. 1296, rehearing denied 65 S.Ct. 1189, 325 U.S. 893, 89 L.Ed. 2005—Dize v. Uniformity

The prohibition of waiver of such claims accords with the congressional policy of uniformity in the application of the provisions of the act to all employers subject thereto unless expressly exempted by the provisions of the act.—Brooklyn Sav. Bank v. O'Neil, N.Y., 65 S.Ct. 895, 324 U.S. 697, 89 L.Ed. 1296, rehearing denied 65 S.Ct. 1189, 325 U.S. 893, 89 L.Ed. 2005—Dize v. Necessity of bringing suit

Where employees had been compelled to bring their demands for overtime compensation to court because of employer's refusal to pay after judgment in injunction suit by administrator requiring employer to recognize validity of claims, employees could recover liquidated damages and attorney's fees notwithstanding their previous execution of releases of claims for penalties in consideration of payment of overtime wages.—Birbalas v. bility for unpaid compensation and liquidated damages in an additional equal amount is a single and entire liability which is not discharged in toto by paying one half of it, even though the employer asserts that he is not within the act.[60]

A few decisions, however, have held that a claim for liquidated damages may be validly released or settled by agreement,[61] and may be a proper subject of accord and satisfaction,[62] where there has been full payment of the amount due for minimum wages and overtime compensation;[63] but, where minimum wages and overtime compensation have not been fully paid under a contract of accord and satisfaction, the contract is not valid as a release of the claim for liquidated damages.[64]

a. In General

Statutes providing for the establishment of minimum wages for women and minors are generally held valid.

Formerly, following a decision of the United States supreme court,[65] statutes authorizing an administrative body to fix minimum wages for adult women measured by the amount necessary to meet the cost of living and to maintain them in good health and protect their morals, and not exclusively by the value and extent of the services rendered by them or the necessities of the employer, were held invalid,[66] although a statute providing for a minimum wage defined as one commensurate with the value of the service or class of service rendered or as one based solely on the reasonable value of the services rendered was held not to come within the condemnation of such holdings.[67]

Retention of money
An employee's retention of moneys paid her by employers under federal district court judgment, requiring restitution of unpaid minimum wages and overtime compensation, in proceeding for enforcement of Fair Labor Standards Act, did not constitute waiver of employee's vested right to recover liquidated damages under such act in state court action against employers.—Slavin v. Trachtenberg, 41 N.Y.S.2d 86, 180 Misc. 324.

Nature of duty
Only where the law imposes a positive duty to pay should a settlement, which is ordinarily favored by the law, be held to be prohibited, and such duty is created by Fair Labor Standards Act only with respect to minimum wages and overtime compensation, and not with respect to liability for liquidated damages.—Cassese v. Manufacturers Trust Co., supra.

Accord and satisfaction
Where payments in settlement of employer's liability for minimum wages and overtime compensation are made under such circumstances as create an agreement of accord and satisfaction, the employee's claim for liquidated damages on the amount given in settlement is extinguished.—Atlantic Co. v. Broughton, C.C.A.Ga., 146 F.2d 480, certiorari denied 65 S.Ct. 1021, two cases, 324 U.S. 883, 89 L.Ed. 1433, rehearing denied 65 S.Ct. 1182, two cases, 325 U.S. 892, 89 L.Ed. 2004, certiorari denied Carthan v. Consideration
Where there was doubt in employer's mind as to his liability for balance of minimum wages, overtime compensation, and liquidated damages, and employees were not claiming that employer was liable, payment of balance due as minimum wages and overtime compensation was a sufficient consideration for release of claim for liquidated damages.—Guess v. Montague, C.C.A.S.C., 140 F.2d 500.

67. U.S.—Walker v. Chapman, D.C. Ohio, 17 F.Supp. 308.

Subsequently, however, the United States supreme court took a different view of such statutes and overruled the earlier cases,[68] and laid down the rule, since followed by other courts, that a statute providing for a minimum wage for women and minors sufficient to meet the cost of living and maintain their health and morals is valid, even though such wage is not measured strictly by the value of the services rendered.[69] Accordingly, statutes prescribing minimum wages required to be paid to women and minor workers,[70] or, more specifically, authorizing administrative bodies or officials to make orders fixing a minimum wage for women as well as for minor workers,[71] or penalizing discrimination in wage rates between men and women under specified conditions,[72] are usually held valid where they supply ample standards.[73] A statute is not invalid which provides for a "guaranteed" minimum wage for women who work any part of a week,[74] where the amount of such minimum is to be measured not only by the value and class of the service rendered but also by the amount required to provide adequate maintenance and to protect health.[75]

b. Construction and Operation Generally

Statutes providing for minimum wages for women and minors should be construed so as to effectuate their aims; the persons and occupations embraced by such statutes depend on their language and terms.

Although statutes providing for minimum wages for women and minors, being penal, require a strict construction,[76] they should nevertheless be construed so as to effectuate as far as possible the purposes for which they are enacted,[77] namely, the establishment of fair wage rates[78] and the protection

Regulations held valid

(1) The adoption of order, prohibiting employers from including female and minor restaurant employees' tips as part of their legal minimum wages fixed by such order, was within power and authority delegated to commission by statute authorizing it to fix wages of women and minor employees adequate to meet necessary cost of proper living and sustain their health and welfare.—California Drive-In Restaurant Ass'n v. (2) Under the Minimum Wage Law a mandatory order forbidding the working of any woman or minor under eighteen years of age more than seven hours per day or forty-two and one-half hours per week or pay of less than sixteen dollars per week was not objectionable as failing to distinguish between minors and adults or between women and boys under eighteen years of age.—McGrew v. "May" construed as "shall"

The word "may," as used in that part of the statute declaring what the administrative body or official "may" take into account, "may" be guided by, or "may" consider in establishing a minimum fair wage, should be interpreted as meaning "shall" in order to carry out the purposes of the statute.

of women and minors in their employment against exploitation and greed.[79] The term "minimum wage," as used in such a statute, means the least wage on which an ordinary individual can be self-sustaining and obtain the ordinary requirements of life;[80] and it has been said that minimum wage legislation does not contemplate the establishment of a wage scale for those who earn more than the minimum necessary for the preservation of health and morals.[81] The construction of administrative rules and regulations is governed by the usual rules applicable to the construction of statutes.[82]

Occupations or establishments within statutes. Except where the statute otherwise provides, all occupations in which women and children are employed come within the minimum wage provisions.[83] However, unless the statute so requires, it is not mandatory on the board or official or other administrative body to take jurisdiction of all employees in the state coming within the purview of the statute;[84] and the question whether or not a particular occupation or establishment comes within the statute or within an order or regulation of the commission or board is determined by the usual rules of construction.[85]

Persons within statute. In determining what persons are included within the protection of such statutes, it has been said that the statutes are designed to reach occupations which furnish the substantial livelihood to workers therein and consume their ordinary work period, and that they do not include workers who do some slight or intermittent daily or weekly service;[86] but the mere fact that a worker's service is periodic or recurrent rather than reg-

Orders as to gratuities

(1) The statute requiring employers to post notices that gratuities given their employees by patrons go to employer and are not shared by employees or notices of extent to which such gratuities are shared between employers and employees did not impliedly annul commission's order prohibiting restaurant operators from including tips or gratuities received by their female and minor employees as part of legal minimum wages fixed by such order, as such statute and order were not irreconcilable, but entirely harmonious.—California Drive-In Restaurant Ass'n v. Beauty culture operator

Order of commission promulgated under minimum wage law, which fixed minimum wage for "operators" in beauty culture industry and provided that beauty industry should include work ordinarily performed in "beauty parlors and similar establishments," was inapplicable to instructor in beauty school, even though she was qualified as an operator.—McDonald v. Goddard, 98 P. 2d 1074, 2 Wash.2d 553.

Laundry

A woman who performed all the duties of a laundry worker in establishment consisting of laundry and dry-cleaning departments operated by employer under the same roof but in separate rooms was "employed in a laundry," within statute providing that a woman thus employed shall receive compensation at double her regular rate of pay for work in excess of nine hours per day.—Campbell Cleaning & Dye Works v. Porter, Tex.Civ.App., 183 S.W.2d 253, error refused.

Public housekeeping establishment

(1) Hotels, restaurants, and inns are "public housekeeping establishments" within order fixing minimum weekly wages for women employees of such establishments, since the main purpose of such institutions is to furnish food, shelter and entertainment to guests.—Pagel v. Trinity Hospital Ass'n, 6 N.W.2d 392, 72 N. D. 262.

(2) A hospital is not a "public housekeeping establishment" within order fixing minimum weekly wages for women employees in such establishments, notwithstanding that hospital must serve food to its patients as an incident to their treatment, since the main purpose of a "hospital" is to care for and give medical attention to patients, and it is an institution in which the sick and injured are cared for, and not a place where people go for food and entertainment.—Pagel v. Trinity Hospital Ass'n, supra.

Restaurant

A drugstore soda fountain at which proprietor dispensed ice cream, sodas, soft drinks, cakes, and cookies, and packaged crackers and candy was not a "restaurant" covered by order promulgated under minimum wage law fixing minimum wages to be paid to minors engaged in establishments at occupations relating to the furnishing of food.—Greco v. Sima, 7 N.W.2d 532, 537, 213 Minn. 526.

ular or constant does not exclude such worker, so long as the work is not also casual.[87] Such statute has been held applicable to all women without respect to their married or economic status;[88] it does not exclude a married woman living with, and partly supported by, her husband.[89] A constitutional provision for the establishment of minimum wages for women and minors has been held to contemplate the relationship of employer and employee,[90] and women who do not come within the category of employees in this sense cannot be included within the operation of a statute or administrative order adopted pursuant thereto.[91] Where the relationship between the parties is essentially that of master and servant, the master cannot escape the minimum wage requirements by designating the relationship a partnership.[92]

c. Functions, Authority, and Decisions of Commission

The functions of a commission authorized to fix minimum wage rates for women and minors pursuant to statute have been held administrative rather than judicial or legislative; and the nature and extent of its duties and authority, as well as the operation and effect of its decisions, depend on the particular statute involved.

A minimum wage commission under a statute providing for the establishment of minimum wages for women and minors has been held to be an administrative body to which neither legislative nor judicial powers are delegated.[93] Where the statute so provides, it is the commission's duty to investigate and ascertain the wages being paid to women and minors in the various occupations and, wherever necessary, to fix a minimum wage adequate to meet the statutory requirements;[94] but the commission has no arbitrary discretion or the power to make arbitrary discriminations, imposing minimum wages and other regulations on some industries and occupations and omitting them from others, according to the dictates of whim or caprice.[95] Where the administrative body is authorized to fix a minimum wage sufficient to meet the cost of living and maintain health, the fact that such minimum is not to be measured strictly by the amount or value of the services rendered does not give such body unlimited authority; its order must be reasonably fit for the enforcement of the policy of the statute under the circumstances of the particular employment.[96] Where the statute does not prescribe the unit of time for which the minimum wage shall be fixed, it has been held proper to fix a weekly minimum wage;[97] and the fact that an order fixing such a wage rate in effect "guarantees" every worker who begins the week the weekly minimum wage does not invalidate it.[98]

Hourly rate for part-time worker

An order providing minimum hourly wage for work performed during week by women or minor apartment house employees employed for less than forty-eight hours during any one week, contemplates an intermittent, and not a full-time, employment, such as one where a woman is hired to work for fewer hours than eight each day and for fewer hours than forty-eight each week and where, after such services have been performed, her time is her own and she thereafter owes no further duty to her employer.—Evans v. Employer's duty respecting records

Power to provide safeguards

The commission's power to provide safeguards to insure employees' receipt of their minimum wages and prevent evasion and subterfuge is "implied power" flowing from power delegated to commission by statute to fix minimum wages.—California Drive-In Restaurant Ass'n v. Clark, 140 P.2d 657, 22 Cal.2d 287, 147 A.L. R. 1028.

Wage order requiring payment of minimum of ten dollars to any minor employee of either sex, or any adult female employee, who works three days or less in any week during peak period in confectionery industry and a minimum of seven dollars a week to any such employee who works two days or less in any week during the dull period in that industry is reasonable and is authorized by statute relating to minimum wages for women and minors.—Mary Lincoln Candies v. Reason for rule

"In a sense the order does fix a guaranteed wage since its enforcement would necessarily result in a situation where every worker who began work at the beginning of any week . . . would be 'guaranteed' a minimum week's pay. . . . But a minimum hourly or daily wage would have the same effect for those periods, respectively, since a mini-

Although a statute authorizing an industrial commission to fix a minimum wage intends a separate investigation and determination for women and minors,[99] it does not follow that the minimum wage for each must be different, and an order thereunder is not invalid because it fixes the same minimum wage for both.[1] Such statutes have been held to intend that the minimum rate shall be based on the nature of the particular occupation and not to authorize a blanket minimum for women or minors, operative on all, without regard to wage conditions in the different occupations,[2] and, where the act contemplates that, because of differences in living costs, the minimum may not be uniform throughout the state, an order is not invalid because it makes a distinction between cities based on the number of inhabitants.[3] Nevertheless, the commission may investigate all occupations together and make one order applying to "each and every occupation," provided the conditions warranting the fixing of a minimum wage in each such occupation are found to exist.[4] An order of the commission is not invalid because it fixes a different minimum for successive periods of service during the period of learning or apprenticeship;[5] nor does the fact that an order fixing minimum wages does not specifically prescribe the period during which employees might be treated as "learners" or "apprentices" render such order void.[6]

In order to make the commission's order effective, fundamental procedural requirements must be observed.[7] Thus, there must be a full and public hearing,[8] and a substantial compliance with mandatory statutory provisions requiring notice of hearings.[9] There must be proper evidence to support the findings of fact;[10] and, at least under some statutes, there must be findings embracing the facts needed to sustain the order,[11] although it has been held that a minimum wage order is neither void nor voidable because unsupported by formal recitals or findings of fact, in the absence of such a requirement in the statute.[12] There must be substantial compliance with a statutory provision requiring that a copy of the order of the commission be mailed to each employer affected as far as it is practicable.[13]

Review of decisions. In a review of the orders of the commission the court is limited to a review of such as are made without jurisdiction, or under a mistake in the interpretation of the law, or which are so arbitrary or unreasonable as to deprive one mum wage fixed by the day would guarantee the worker a day's wage for every day in which he worked at all—likewise as to an hourly minimum. . . . In this sense, every minimum wage is a 'guaranteed' wage for some period of time and to say that this makes the wage statute or wage order invalid, would be to say that all minimum wage legislation is invalid."—Hutchins v. Presumption

The fact that commission in promulgating minimum wage order relating to women did not investigate any particular occupation, but made a blanket investigation of all occupations, did not invalidate order, in view of presumption of existence of facts justifying specific exercise of authority by an administrative tribunal.—Martin v. Publication
Statute authorizing fixing by commission of minimum wages for women and minors employed in industry, providing that notice of hearing by commission shall be given by advertisement in at least one newspaper published in specified cities in the state, impliedly required that purpose of the hearing should be stated in the notice.—People v. Johnson, supra.

Certainty of notice
Notice that purpose of hearing by commission was to rescind, amend, or alter orders relating to "unclassified occupations" and that minimum wages paid to women and minors would be considered was too vague and uncertain to support any hearing or order, since "unclassified" merely means not classified and "classified" means grouped in classes, and the term "unclassified occupations" standing alone would have little, if any, significance as a means of giving notice.—People v. Johnson, supra.

Necessity of finding on face of order
Where trial court found that every act required by statute to be done by commission in promulgation and adoption of order was done within time and in manner and form required by statute, fact that no finding by commission that wages fixed were adequate to meet costs of proper living, as specified in statute, appeared on face of order did not invalidate it.—California Drive-In Restaurant Ass'n v. of the guaranteed protection of his property rights.[14] A determination by the commission or board within the limits of its authority and duly arrived at on substantial compliance with procedural requirements and sufficiently supported by the evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.[15] Such an order cannot be collaterally attacked except on jurisdictional or constitutional grounds.[16]

d. Effect of Violation

Violations of minimum wage requirements are, under some statutes, punishable as misdemeanors; a violation of such requirements may give rise to a cause of action for damages or for the difference between the amount paid and the amount that should have been paid.

The statutes in a number of jurisdictions denounce violations of minimum wage requirements as to women and minors as misdemeanors.[17] Such statutes have been held valid;[18] and their construction and operation are governed by the usual rules applicable to criminal statutes.[19] Under a statute penalizing discrimination against women employees, it has been held that women who have suffered financial damage by reason of such discrimination may maintain an action at law to recover such damages;[20] and some statutes expressly authorize a recovery in a civil action of the full amount of the minimum wage less any amounts actually paid, together with costs and reasonable attorney's fees,[21] notwithstanding the employee's agreement to work for less than the minimum wage.[22]

(1) In General

Statutes providing that public employees or employees on public works shall be paid no less than a stated minimum or no less than the prevailing rate for similar work are generally held valid, and, except for penal provisions therein, should be liberally construed.

In a number of jurisdictions, under statutory provisions to such effect, designated classes of public employees or of employees engaged on public works are required to be paid at a rate not less than a stated or ascertainable minimum or not less than the prevailing rate for similar work in the same locality.[23] While particular statutes of this character have been held invalid for various reasons,[24] it is generally held that such statutes are valid as being within the power of the state to prescribe the conditions under which it will permit work to be done in behalf of itself or any of its subdivisions.[25] Such statutes are meant not only to establish individual private rights in favor of the employees embraced by their provisions, but also to declare and carry into effect a matter of public policy;[26] they must, therefore, tend reasonably to advance the public interest.[27] The legislature may be expressly empowered by constitutional provision to regulate the wages of employees of the state or any civil division thereof, or of any contractor or subcontractor performing work for the state or a civil division thereof.[28]

In like manner, a municipality may, under the authority of its charter, fix the minimum rate of wages to be paid to laborers employed by the city or contractors on city work,[29] but it may not do so where no authority is granted in the charter.[30] Although the power of a city council to fix the minimum rate of wages to be paid by it or its contractors to laborers is subject to the implied duties to keep within the bounds of what is reasonable and proper,[31] it has been held that ordinances to enforce such a provision are valid, even if such wages are unreasonable.[32] The fact that a municipal corporation has power to fix the compensation of its officers and employees does not relieve it of the duty of complying with the limitation of minimum wage statutes or constitutional provisions.[33]

It has been held that minimum wage provisions should be liberally construed to attain the end in view,[34] and the meaning of terms used therein should be determined from the context and the Purpose and intent

(1) The intent of statute requiring employers to pay to employees employed on public work prevailing rate of wages as determined by body awarding the contract is the recovery of penalty by way of indemnity to the public by reason of violation of the statute, and to charge employer with pecuniary liability, and not to punish employer.—Shalz v. Compensation of public employees apart from minimum wage provisions is discussed in Counties §§ 109–122; in the C.J.S. title Municipal Corporations §§ 720–729, also 43 C.J. p 902 note 24–p 908 note 43; in the C.J.S. title States §§ 88–99, also 59 C.J. p 152 note 97–p 161 note 14; and in the C.J.S. title United States §§ 43–48, also 65 C.J. p 1278 note 7–p 1284 note 13.

(2) Operation and Effect Generally

The operation and effect of minimum wage provisions affecting public employees depend on their terms and language; such provisions generally include public employees and employees of contractors doing public work.

The operation and effect of minimum wage provisions affecting public employees or employees on public works depend on the terms of the particular constitutional or statutory provision involved and the language employed therein,[38] and contractual provisions in contravention of the statute are void.[39] Although the statute imposes good faith and diligence on the contractor to see that the directions and purposes of the act are carried out, it does not make a contractor guarantee against every possible accidental and unintentional violation,[40] be adopted which would be most favorable to parties seeking to obtain from city the wage rate which the statute calls for.—McKibbin v. City of New York, 51 N.Y.S.2d 50, 182 Misc. 671, affirmed 53 N.Y.S.2d 474, 269 App.Div. 696, affirmed 64 N.E.2d 288, 295 N.Y. 592.

The remedial or procedural provisions of statute under which laborers on public works must be paid not less than prevailing rate of wages will not be restricted within limits narrower than the affirmative rights and obligations which may be conveniently enforced through their application.—Heaney v. McGoldrick, 35 N.E.2d 641, 286 N.Y. 38.

In "accord" with prevailing rates

A city charter provision that compensation of employees should be "in accord" with prevailing wages for like service in private employment or other comparable governmental organizations does not require that compensation be identical with, or not higher than, generally prevailing rates but that there be a reasonable or just correspondence between the rates established and those elsewhere prevailing.—City and County of San Francisco v. Contracts included

(1) As respects the question whether a contract is one for "labor" so as to come within a provision requiring the payment of not less than the prevailing rate of wages to employees engaged in the performance of a contract for labor on a public work, if the contract is for the manufacture of goods or wares for a purchaser on his special order and not for the general market, it is a "contract for labor," while, if the contract is for the manufacture of goods or wares suitable for general trade or contains a stipulation by the manufacturer for future sale of articles which he is habitually making, it is "contract of sale."—Hague v. Cleary, Cal., 48 P.2d 5.

(2) A charter provision requiring minimum wages on contracts for public works was applicable only to a contract for work which was let pursuant to a resolution calling for bids, and was not applicable to a contract of city with several contiguous cities to conduct a joint survey of sewage problem, by term of which another city was to become sponsor of proposed survey.—City of Oakland v. Williams, 103 P.2d 168, 15 Cal.2d 542.

What constitutes "wages"

(1) Contributions of the city to the pension fund for the benefit of an employee are not ordinarily considered part of the wages paid him in determining whether such employee had been paid less than the minimum wage.

(3) However, it has been held that an annual cash clothing allowance made by city to firemen was part of "compensation" of firemen within meaning of minimum wage law.—McGuire v. City of Dallas, 170 S.W.2d 722, 141 Tex. 170.

Grade crossings

Statute regulating wages on all work of every kind on "elimination of railroad grade crossings" is applicable to alterations in existing bridges or approaches, where there is no existing crossing at grade.—Erie R. Co. v. Department of Labor of State of New York, 251 N.Y.S. 581, 233 App. Div. 35.

Effect of other statutes

Statute fixing minimum wages on public works generally was held not impliedly repealed by subsequent statute limited to laborers or mechanics in construction, alteration, or repair of public building where contract price exceeds one thousand dollars.—State v. Jaastad, 32 P.2d 799, 43 Ariz. 458.

and such a statute does not require a contractor to employ exclusively journeymen workmen, the statute being complied with where the contractor pays the prevailing rate for the particular class of labor actually employed.[41]

Employees and employments included. A provision for the payment of minimum wages to public employees extends to all employees who come within its terms.[42] Such statutes have been held applicable to municipal,[43] state,[44] and county[45] employees; and constitutional and statutory provisions, not expressly applicable to public employees but requiring the payment of no less than the prevailing rate to laborers, workmen, or mechanics in the employ of contractors engaged in performing public works have been held applicable to municipal[46] employees and the same principle also ap-

42. Manual or mechanical labor

(1) The statute prescribing a minimum wage scale for persons doing "manual or mechanical labor" for, or in behalf of, the state or its subdivisions applies to a person doing the work of a mechanic or manual laborer in the usually accepted sense of these words, and will, therefore, normally apply to a laborer whose tenure is so limited in duration that he is usually paid wages by the day rather than salary by the month or year, and whose total annual compensation is generally uncertain or fluctuating.—State v. Angle, 91 P.2d 705, 54 Ariz. 13—State v. Ash, 87 P.2d 270, 53 Ariz. 197.

(2) Accordingly, prison guards and prison matron whose duty was to watch inmates of prison to keep them from escaping, and whose compensation was fixed on annual basis for many years by the Legislature, were held not engaged in "mechanical" or "manual" labor with protection of minimum wage law.—State v. Ash, supra.

(3) However, this does not mean that such a minimum wage law does not apply to employees whose occupation is, within the generally accepted sense of the words, truly mechanical or manual labor, merely because it may happen that for some reason or another their compensation may have been fixed on an annual or monthly basis rather than a per diem.—State v. Angle, supra—State v. Ash, supra.

"Laborer employed on public work"

"Laborer," as used in city charter provision fixing minimum wages for all "laborers employed on public or municipal works" and for "all labor performed by a man and team," refers to one ordinarily engaged in construction work, or what is commonly designated as public works falling within the department of improvement of parks; hence one employed as a "houseman" at a hospital owned and operated by a city was not a "laborer employed on public or municipal work."—Carter v. City and County of Denver, 160 P.2d 991, 114 Colo. 33.

Policemen

(1) Under the Policemen's Minimum Salaries Act, the chief of police and all patrolmen, including those who are only de facto officers of the city, are within the provisions of the statute.—Kohler v. City of Kewanee, 53 N.E.2d 479, 321 Ill.App. 479.

(2) Where plaintiffs were appointed to police department of city and completed one year's duty as regularly employed patrolmen, they became "policemen" within contemplation of Policemen's Minimum Wage Act immediately upon appointment and were then entitled to receive minimum wages, since Policemen's Minimum Wage Act applies to any member of a regularly constituted police department of a city commissioned to perform police duties, including patrolmen.—Morgan v. City of Rockford, 31 N.E.2d 596, 375 Ill. 326.

(3) Policewomen, police matrons, and clerks of identification bureau are within the protection of the Policemen's Minimum Wage Act.—Patteson v. City of Peoria, 54 N.E.2d 445, 386 Ill. 460.

Firemen

Under the Firemen's Minimum Salaries Act, the chief of the fire department and all firemen, including those who are only de facto officers of the city, are within the provisions of the statute.—Kohler v. City of Kewanee, 53 N.E.2d 479, 321 Ill.App. 479.

Discharged employees

Ordinances purporting to discharge firemen and policemen did not affect rights of plaintiffs suing to recover differences between pay received and pay fixed by Minimum Salaries Act for firemen and policemen, where no plaintiff was ever notified that he was discharged and each plaintiff was continued in his employment as regular member of department without interruption or change in compensation.—Kohler v. City of Kewanee, supra.

Particular employees included

(1) A pipe caulker in the department of water supply, gas, and electricity of the city of New York is within the provision.—Walsh v. New York City Employees' Retirement System, 8 N.E.2d 875, 274 N.Y. 319.

(2) Ungraded civil service manual workers engaged in maintenance work on independent city-owned subway system were employed on "public works" entitling them to invoke the statute.—Gaston v. Taylor, 9 N.E.2d 9, 274 N.Y. 359.

(3) A foreman of a city's gang of bridgemen and riveters was a "laborer, workman, or mechanic" within the meaning of the statute in view of the conditions of his job.—Austin

plies to state[47] employees having the title or falling within the category of "workmen, laborers, or mechanics," as well as to employees of independent contractors performing work for the state or its subdivisions.[48] Employees of independent contractors doing public work are of course within the statute where the statute expressly provides that they shall be deemed to be employed by, or on behalf of, the state or its political subdivisions.[49] It has been held that a statute governing the minimum wages to be paid employees of a contractor engaged on a public work is not applicable to an employee engaged in a private enterprise of a contractor in charge of a public work, where the two enterprises are separate in time and space.[50]

In order to invoke the protection of a statute prescribing a minimum wage scale for public employees, a claimant must have performed services or labor under authority of law.[51]

Classification of employees or employments. An employee is entitled to the minimum wage applicable to the class of employees to which he belongs and no more;[52] and he cannot compel a reclassification placing him in a category of workers into which, from the nature of his duties and conditions of his job, he does not properly fall.[53] Similarly, a person employed in one capacity cannot recover the minimum wage payable to persons employed in another capacity constituting a different category of civil servant,[54] even though he happens to perform the same duties as those performed by employees of other classes for which he has not qualified.[55]

(3) Determination of Prevailing Rate

(b) Effect of determination

v. City of New York, 179 N.E. 313, 258 N.Y. 113.

Particular employees excluded

(1) A person holding under a yearly employment at a fixed salary and furnished with board and lodging, without charge, by the municipality is not within the statute.—Bock v. City of New York, 63 N.Y.S. 825, 64 N.Y.S. 777, 31 Misc. 55.

(2) A person, such as a wireman in a fire alarm bureau, who is employed to respond to calls for service rather than to work regular hours is not within the statute.—McNulty v. New York, 143 N.E. 781, 238 N.Y. 29.

Compliance with civil service law

The statute providing that prevailing rate of wages should be paid for legal day's work to laborers, workmen, or mechanics on public works is subservient to mandates of the civil service law; hence a laborer, workman, or mechanic cannot recover prevailing rate of wage for a position in service of municipality unless he shows as a condition precedent that he has been duly appointed to such position pursuant to requirements of civil service law.—Maystrik v. City of New York, 300 N.Y.S. 479, 165 Misc. 327.

Work in emergency

(1) Under a statute limiting the working day of public employees to a stated number of hours except in an emergency, an employee cannot recover for work in excess of the hours allowed unless such work was actually rendered in an emergency.—City of Glendale v. Dixon, 75 P.2d 683, 51 Ariz. 206.

(2) The necessity of looking after irrigating water delivered at regular intervals to city in large quantities to prevent flooding of property of residents was not an "emergency" which would entitle common laborer in city's irrigation department to wages for hours worked in excess of eight per day, where attention required to be given water was not an unforeseen circumstance, but was merely the work which laborer performed regularly.—City of Glendale v. Dixon, 75 P.2d 42, 51 Ariz. 86, adhered to 75 P.2d 683, 51 Ariz. 206.

(3) On the other hand, under a statute providing for payment for overtime worked generally but penalizing the municipality or official requiring or permitting overtime except in an emergency, an employee has been held entitled to compensation for overtime at the statutory rate whether or not such work was performed in an emergency.—McGuire v. City of Dallas, 170 S.W.2d 722, 141 Tex. 170.

Employee passing new examination

One appointed as a result of a civil service examination for electrical inspector, but performing the duties of an electrician after passing the examination for that position, is entitled to the benefits of the statute as applied to electricians.—Lent v. City of New York, 269 N.Y.S. 201, 150 Misc. 291, affirmed 275 N.Y.S. 342, 242 App.Div. 764.

(a) In General

Under some statutes a designated official is authorized and in some cases required to investigate, conduct an inquiry in the prescribed manner, and determine the prevailing wage rate for particular kinds of work.

While contractual provisions setting out the manner of determining the prevailing wage rate in the locality have been held valid so long as they do not contravene the statute,[56] some statutes authorize a designated official to investigate, hold hearings, and determine the prevailing rate of wages in the locality in which the work or contract is being performed.[57] Where the statute so provides, such official may institute the inquiry on his own motion[58] and, if a complaint is filed, he must investigate the charges.[59]

Under a statute providing that every contract for public work to which the state is a party must incorporate a provision for the payment of not less than the prevailing wage rates, and that a schedule of such rates must be made part of the contract, and that the invitation for bids on a particular project must set out the wage rate deemed applicable thereto, where a controversy arises as to whether the rates mentioned in the invitation are actually the prevailing rates, the administrative body is required to make a determination of the prevailing rate before the formal execution of the contract;[60] and, if no objection to the rates is made until after the contract is awarded, the administrative body is

No conflict with constitution

The provision of the labor law requiring the fiscal officer to order a hearing with respect to prevailing rate of wages in locality within state where public work is being performed does not conflict with constitutional provision relating to hours and wages in public work, since that statute merely provides the machinery necessary to obtain the benefits of the constitutional provision.—Kaufman v. City of New York, 61 N.Y.S.2d 779.

What constitutes "fixing" of prevailing rate

(1) Where municipal auto machinists who were civil service employees filed claim with city for difference between rate paid to auto machinists and rate paid other machinists, action of comptroller in recommending that claimants be paid such difference to avoid threatened lawsuit was not a fixing of prevailing rate of wages but only an adjustment of claims and did not constitute basis for an action by other auto machinists to recover difference between wages paid and alleged prevailing rate.—Cirillo v. City of New York, 10 N.Y.S.2d 472, 170 Misc. 230, affirmed 19 N.Y.S.2d 151, 259 App.Div. 717, reargument denied 20 N.Y.S.2d 402, 259 App.Div. 875, affirmed, 39 N.E.2d 273, 287 N.Y. 641.

(2) Report of examiner in comptroller's office that wages of electrical workers in building trades were increased under written agreement between the electrical contractors association and the electrical workers union did not constitute a prevailing rate determination, where the report was silent as to how many persons in the trade were affected by the agreement.—Ipsmiller v. City of New York, 275 N.Y.S. 827, 153 Misc. 627.

Where exclusive jurisdiction is conferred on administrative body to determine the prevailing wage rate, in the absence of such a determination the courts have no jurisdiction to adjudicate with respect thereto.—Southern Prison Co. v. Rennels, Tex. Civ.App., 110 S.W.2d 606, error dismissed.

Necessity of dispute

Before the commissioner of labor can take cognizance of a complaint of violation of the statute and proceed to a determination of the prevailing wage rate, a dispute regarding the prevailing rate must have arisen between the parties which cannot be adjusted by the contracting officer.—In re Rate of Wages on Sewage Disposal Plant at Princeton, 160 A. 408, 10 N.J.Misc. 603.

60. Colo.—Denver Bldg. & Const. Trades Council v. Vail, 86 P.2d 267, 103 Colo. 364.

Existence of dispute

Where trades council, speaking for union labor in lines of work involved in proposed state highway construction, complained that wage rates, incorporated in published invitation for bids, were not prevailing rates, a "dispute" arose within statute requiring provision for payment of prevailing rates in state construction contracts, so as to require industrial commission to take jurisdiction for purpose of determining prevailing rates.—Denver Bldg. & Const. Trades Council v. Vail, supra.

without jurisdiction to make a determination as to the prevailing rate applicable to such contract.[61] By statute, the legislature may withdraw from the administrative body or official the function of determining the prevailing wage rate to govern certain public contracts, and substitute therefor legislative rates.[62]

Scope and conduct of inquiry. The designated official is sometimes authorized and under a duty to adopt reasonable rules,[63] and an inquiry should cover the entire period to be affected by the finding or order;[64] and evidence of the rate prevailing at any time within such period should not be excluded.[65] Technical rules of evidence are inapplicable in such a proceeding,[66] and hearsay evidence is admissible,[67] although it cannot serve as the sole basis of the determination.[68] A wage scale fixed for another project at a considerable time previously may be taken into consideration, although it is not conclusive.[69] However, the evidence should be limited to wages prevailing among workmen of the same class and in the same locality.[70]

Under a statute so providing, where the inquiry is to determine the prevailing rate to which certain workmen are entitled, the wages paid to those very workmen should not be permitted to affect the result; in other words, those workmen should be disregarded and only the rate of wages prevailing among other workmen considered,[71] and the same has been held true in the absence of statute,[72] at least where the contract does not otherwise provide.[73] However, this rule does not prevent taking into account the wages received by other employees of the same contractor where they are engaged on other and private contracts.[74] The determination of the fiscal officer that the employees fall into a particular category will not be disturbed unless it is arbitrary.[75] Differentiation between classes of employees for the purpose of determining the prevailing rate for similar work must be based on reasonable grounds;[76] but the fact that different groups of employees perform similar work does not prevent their being differentiated on the basis of the different fields in which they work, the conditions of their employment, and the scope of their activities.[77]

(b) Effect of Determination

A prevailing rate once established is presumed to continue in the absence of contrary proof, and requires the employer to pay at such rate in the future and to make up the deficiency as to the past, at least from the time complaint was made; but such a determination is subject to modification on proof of changed circumstances.

A rate established as the prevailing rate of wages is presumed to continue in the absence of proof that it has changed,[78] and obligates the employer to pay the difference between the amounts which should have been paid at such rate and the amounts actu-

Income and security

The statute requiring that wages paid motor grader operators employed by city be not less than prevailing daily rate in same trade or occupation and in same locality does not permit differentiation between such employees' daily wages and those of such operators employed by private contractors because of economic security and larger annual income of operators in steady employ of city throughout year.—Watson v. McGoldrick, supra.

Time for review

Statute providing for commencement of action within three months of "final order" of industrial commissioner determining prevailing wage for public works contemplates that defeated party have thirty-day period to review commissioner's order.—Rainville v. Keil, 266 N.Y.S. 867, 148 Misc. 795.

ally paid in the past[79] commencing, under some provisions, from the time of filing of a verified complaint or claim,[80] and to continue to pay the same rate in the future at least until modification of the order.[81] However, under a statute to such effect the contractor may at any time after such a determination, on a verified complaint, apply for and obtain a hearing, investigation, and modification of the order on proof of facts showing a change in the prevailing rate,[82] and such new determination may not be refused on the ground that the contractor had failed to comply with the original order.[83]

(4) Remedies

Various statutory remedies are available to enforce the rights of public employees or employees on public works with respect to wages; and it is held that as a general rule such rights cannot be waived.

Under some statutes, an employee who has been paid at a rate below the amount payable under the law may maintain an action for the difference between the amount paid and the amount which should have been paid.[84] A statute providing a method for enforcing the obligation to pay laborers on public works prevailing wages has been held not to supply a substitute for an effective common-law remedy but to supply an effective remedy where none existed before.[85] Since, as stated supra subdivision a (1) of this section, minimum wage laws are not intended merely to establish individual private rights but are intended to state and carry into effect public policy as well, its provisions are not subject to waiver;[86] and, unless the statute otherwise provides, an employee will not be precluded, by waiver or estoppel, from recovering the difference between

Necessity of protest

(1) Fact that city employees are within purview of constitutional provision relating to hours and wages on public works does not impair efficacy of provision of code that employee failing to note a formal protest when signing city pay roll forfeits his rights to advance his claim against the city.—McKibbin v. City of New York, 53 N.Y.S.2d 474, 269 App.Div. 696, affirmed 64 N.E.2d 288, 295 N.Y. 592.

Necessity of complaint

Complaint of state contractor that commissioner did not act on its application for modification of order respecting prevailing rate of wages in locality was without merit, statute requiring written verified complaint.—Carder Realty Corporation v. Conflict with budget or appropriation

(1) The fact that a city budget appropriates a certain fund for particular work on the basis of paying the employees engaged in such work less than the minimum wage does not excuse it from paying such employees the prescribed minimum wage, since there is nothing to prevent the city from discontinuing the work when the fund appropriated is exhausted; but, after the fund is exhausted, employees cannot recover the difference between the wages paid them and the prescribed minimum wage, since the city will not be required by the courts to expend funds in excess of the budget except where such expenditure is authorized by the legislature.—City of Phœnix v. Kidd, 92 P.2d 513, 54 Ariz. 75, reheard 94 P.2d 428, 54 Ariz. 123, followed in City of Phœnix v. Price, 94 P.2d 433, 54 Ariz. 137, City of Phœnix v. Enriquez, 94 P.2d 434, 54 Ariz. 138, and City of Phœnix v. Wilson, 94 P.2d 434, 54 Ariz. 139.

(2) The employment after enactment of appropriation law providing less compensation than that fixed by general minimum wage law was "authorized by law" within statute prohibiting state indebtedness in excess of money appropriated unless expressly "authorized by law," and hence state was legally indebted to such employees for difference between amount paid them under appropriation law and amount fixed by minimum wage law.—State v. Angle, 91 P.2d 705, 54 Ariz. 13.

Rates fixed in contract

Where the agreement in the contract is not merely to pay wages at an unfixed rate not less than the prevailing rate, but is an agreement to pay wages at rates fixed in accordance with the statute and set forth in a schedule of wages annexed to the contract, the employee may maintain a common-law action for breach of the contract between his employer and the governmental agency.—Fata v. the amount paid and the amount which should have been paid merely because he accepted such compensation without objection[87] or because he agreed to such disregard or evasion of the minimum wage provision.[88]

Deduction of amount of wages due employees before paying contractor. Under some statutes, the officer or agency whose duty it is to pay for work done for the state or a subdivision thereof is authorized to deduct from any payments made to the contractor the amounts admitted or established to be owing to employees on the project,[89] and it has been held that deductions may be made from the sums payable to the general contractor for the amount of wages admittedly due the employees of a defaulting subcontractor.[90] Where a statute imposes a penalty for violation of minimum wage provisions and provides that deduction of the amount thereof before payments are made to the contractor shall be the exclusive mode of enforcement, there can be no recovery of such penalty after final payment to the contractor has been made.[91]

Criminal liability. Under some statutes, violation of minimum wage provisions affecting public employees constitutes a criminal offense;[92] but, in the absence of a provision therefor, no criminal liability attaches for violation of such minimum wage requirements.[93]

b. Under Federal Statutes

Under federal statutes, certain contracts with the government are required to stipulate for the payment of prevailing wages to the contractor's employees, and the secretary of labor is authorized to determine prevailing wage rates and to enforce the provisions of such statutes generally.

Under a federal statute, contracts with the government for the manufacture or furnishing of materials, supplies, articles, and equipment in any amount exceeding a specified sum must represent and stipulate for the payment of not less than the minimum wages as determined by the secretary of labor to be the prevailing minimum wage in the locality in which the goods are to be manufactured.[94] The statute is not of general applicability to industry, but only to contractors who voluntarily enter into competition to obtain government business on terms of which they are fairly forewarned;[95] it does not represent an exercise by congress of regulatory power over private business or employment, but is simply a direction to its agents to fix the terms and conditions under which the government will permit goods to be sold to it.[96] The act bestows no litigable rights on those desirous of selling to the government;[97] and prospective bidders on government purchasing contracts have no standing to question the standards set by the secretary of labor as those required to be incorporated in the contracts.[98]

Purpose of statute

(1) The purpose of the statute is to impose obligations on those favored with government business and to obviate the possibility that any part of the tremendous national expenditures would go to forces tending to depress wages and purchasing power and offending fair social standards of employment.—Perkins v. Lukens Steel Co., App.D.C., 60 S.Ct. 869, 310 U.S. 113, 84 L.Ed. 1108.

(2) The purpose of the act is to use the leverage of the government's immense purchasing power to raise labor standards.—Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Perkins, N.Y., 63 S.Ct. 339, 317 U.S. 501, 87 L.Ed. 424.

Employees within statute

The statute covers those employees, regardless of location of factories or departments, whose tasks are a part of, and normally associated with, production of articles under contract with the government, and the act applies in all factories where the production is a part of an uninterrupted process of manufacture; the act does not cover employees working on parts where, until after manufacture, it is impossible to determine whether the parts are suitable for use under contracts, with the government, since such employees are manufacturing for general stock, as distinguished from working on contracts even though some of the parts, after manufacture, are selected as suitable material for manufacture under contracts.—Perkins v. Endicott Johnson Corporation, D.C.N.Y., 40 F.Supp. 254, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., 128 F.2d 208, affirmed Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Perkins, 63 S.Ct. 339, 317 U.S. 501, 87 L.Ed. 424.

97. U.S.—Perkins v. Lukens Steel Co., supra.

98. U.S.—Perkins v. Lukens Steel Co., supra.

Vindication of general interest does not constitute a basis on which prospective bidders can claim the right to complain of an alleged erroneous construction of the statute by the secretary of labor.—Perkins v. Lukens Steel Co., supra.

The secretary of labor is directed to administer the act,[99] and is empowered to make investigations and findings and to prosecute any inquiry necessary to its administration,[1] and he is specifically authorized, in so doing, to hold hearings on complaint of any breach[2] and to issue orders requiring the attendance of witnesses and the production of evidence under oath,[3] which orders may be enforced in a proper proceeding in a District Court of the United States.[4] The secretary has power to make any decisions, based on findings of fact, which are deemed to be necessary to enforce the provisions of the act.[5] Findings of fact, which the secretary is directed and empowered to make after notice and hearing, are made conclusive on all parties to the contract and on all agencies of the United States, and, if supported by the preponderance of the evidence, conclusive in any court of the United States.[6] The act provides for liquidated damages for violations of required stipulations in the contract[7], and, unless the secretary of labor otherwise recommends, bars any firm or subsidiary found to have defaulted in its obligation under the act from being awarded any government contract for three years from the date the secretary determines such breach to have occurred.[8]

Under another federal statute, specifications for certain contracts with the government for construction or repair of public buildings or public works must provide for the payment to employees on such projects of prevailing minimum wages as determined by the secretary of labor, and all contracts based on such specifications must stipulate for the payment of wages at rates not less than those stat-

1. U.S.—Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Perkins, N.Y., 63 S.Ct. 339, 317 U.S. 501, 87 L.Ed. 424.

Who may be investigated

The statute does not give the secretary of labor general investigatory powers, but gives such powers only over factories and employees engaged in the performance of governmental contracts.—Perkins v. Endicott Johnson Corporation, D.C.N.Y., 37 F.Supp. 604, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., 128 F.2d 208, affirmed Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Perkins, 63 S.Ct. 339, 317 U.S. 501, 87 L.Ed. 424.

Sufficiency of preliminary data

An administrative body should not begin proceeding to determine whether act has been violated unless the body has made at least a tacit tentative determination that the data already before it is sufficient to justify the institution of such an inquiry.—Perkins v. Endicott Johnson Corporation, C.C.A.N.Y., 128 F.2d 208, affirmed Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Perkins, 63 S.Ct. 339, 317 U.S. 501, 87 L.Ed. 424.

Scope of investigation

The scope of the investigation extends to determining which employees are covered by the contract in question, whether payments to them were lower than the scale fixed pursuant to the statute, and when the last underpayment was made.—Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Perkins, N.Y., 63 S.Ct. 339, 317 U.S. 501, 87 L.Ed. 424.

Order of matters investigated

The secretary of labor is not required to investigate and determine whether particular employees or employees in a particular plant or factory are within the statute and contract before examining the pay roll and other records of such plant or factory to determine whether there have been any underpayments.—Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Perkins, supra.

2. U.S.—Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Perkins, supra.

3. Validity of provision

The power to issue subpoenas delegated to secretary of labor by the statute is within limits of congressional authority.—Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Perkins, supra.

4. U.S.—Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Perkins, supra.

Issues before court

Where secretary of labor sought enforcement of subpoena issued to investigate alleged underpayment of employees in particular plants by manufacturer having government contract, and the evidence sought was not plainly incompetent or irrelevant to any lawful purpose of the secretary, it was duty of district court to order its production, and court was not authorized to decide whether such plants were covered by the act and the contract.—Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Perkins, supra.

Defense to enforcement of order

Matters relating to the meaning of a government contract and of the statute, the possible retroactive effect of administrative rulings and regulations, nature of manufacturer's business organization, and practices obtaining at manufacturer's plants, although entitled to consideration in defense against complaint of violation of the statute, could not be accepted as defense against subpoena issued in investigating such violation.—Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Perkins, supra.

Decision on pleadings

Where administrative pleadings asking for enforcement of subpoenas duces tecum stated in effect that the plants whose records were sought to be examined for possible violations were covered by the contract with the government, the trial court should have accepted such preliminary determination instead of taking evidence on the question, and should have enforced the subpoenas on the pleadings.—Perkins v. Endicott Johnson Corporation, C.C.A.N.Y., 128 F.2d 208, affirmed Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Perkins, 63 S.Ct. 339, 317 U.S. 501, 87 L.Ed. 424.

Review

On appeal from order dismissing application of secretary of labor for enforcement of administrative subpoena duces tecum, it is sufficient to follow the simplified procedure of the federal rules, even though those rules may not be fully applicable to preappellate stages of that type of proceeding.—Perkins v. Endicott Johnson Corporation, C.C.A.N.Y., 128 F.2d 208, affirmed Endicott Johnson Corporation v. Perkins, 63 S.Ct. 339, 317 U.S. 501, 87 L.Ed. 424.

Determination of coverage

ed in the specifications.[9] Where the secretary of labor makes a finding as to the prevailing wage rate as of a particular time, employees who were paid less than such prevailing wage rate are entitled to recover the difference between what they received and what they should have received after such time;[10] but they are not entitled to recover the difference for any periods prior to such date where the secretary's determination makes no finding as to the wage rate prevalent during such earlier periods.[11] It has been held that workmen on federal public projects have rights under the statute and the contracts between their employers and the United States to prevailing wages which cannot be diminished by the private contract of such workers.[12]

Under a statute providing that the wages of federal government employees or employees of contractors engaged in the performance of federal government contracts shall be computed on a basic day rate of eight hours per day and work in excess of eight hours per day shall be permitted on compensation for all hours worked in excess of eight hours per day at not less than one and one-half times the basic rate of pay, it has been held that, since the statute does not expressly so provide, a workman required to work more than eight hours a day is not entitled to maintain an action for overtime pay.[13] So, too, it has been held that an employee has no right of action against his employer for alleged violation of statutory provisions requiring the payment of prevailing wages;[14] the only remedy in such case is the administrative procedure whereby funds may be withheld by the government from sums due the employer, if claim therefor is timely made.[15]

Strict construction

(1) The statute making it a misdemeanor to fail to pay wages of employees in accordance with provisions of Labor Law should be strictly construed, since offense did not exist at common law and is not malum in se but malum prohibitum. —People v. Grass, 11 N.Y.S.2d 803, 257 App.Div. 1.

(2) Section of Penal Law, providing that officer of corporate employer who knowingly permits corporation to violate Labor Law by failing to pay employees' wages in accordance with the provisions of the Labor Law shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, is also to be strictly construed, since offense did not exist at common law and is not "malum in se" but "malum prohibitum," and, in absence of proof that officer aided in misdemeanor charged officer may not be adjudged guilty.—People v.

ter statute is to protect the class of persons who are within the safeguards of the labor law,[18] that is, persons who are "employees" within such law and who earn wages,[19] but it has also been held that the statute is violated by nonpayment of wages to any person who is an employee within the ordinary and common connotation of that term, and that the offense is not restricted to employees as defined by the labor law.[20]

Other statutory provisions have been construed and applied which render a corporation liable for wages of employees of its "contractors,"[21] which prohibit the shipment in interstate commerce of any goods produced in an establishment situated in the United States in or about which, within a stated period prior to the removal of such goods therefrom, any oppressive child labor has been employed,[22] which require that persons working on Sunday should receive time and a half pay for all hours worked,[23] or which require an employer who is engaged as a lessee in mining or quarrying to furnish a bond to secure the payment of wages to employees, unless he owns the machinery, tools, and appliances used in operating the mine, and the value of such property is double the amount of the weekly pay roll.[24] Some provisions prohibit the receipt or acceptance of gratuities by agents, employees, or servants under agreement to act in some particular manner in relation to the business of the principal, employer, or master,[25] but in order to constitute a violation of such statute, there must be proof of payment of money to influence the employee in a way inconsistent with his duties toward the employer, and the statutory prohibition is limited to the giving of a gratuity, and not the return of expenditures incurred in serving both the donor and employer in accordance with the instructions of the employer.[26]

Labor union

The statute prohibiting receipt or acceptance of gratuities by agent, employee or servant under agreement to act in some particular manner in relation to business of principal, employer or master was not intended to include an employee of a labor union, and the word "business" was not intended to refer to an organization such as a labor union.—People v. Graf, supra.

26. N.Y.—People v. Graf, supra.

The phrase "particular manner" in statute prohibiting receipt or acceptance of gratuities by agent, employee or servant under agreement to act in some particular manner in relation to business of principal, employer or master, was intended to mean a particular manner which would serve the purpose of donor of money rather than that of employer, and that money was given and accepted with intention to affect some decision by employee involving exercise of discretion on his part with respect to his employer's interest.—People v. Graf, supra.

for such excess work on the theory of an implied promise by the employer to pay for it.

Where the statute fixes a maximum number of hours as constituting a day's labor[27] or a maximum number of days or hours in the week that an employee may be required to work,[28] an employee who works in excess of such time is generally held not entitled to extra compensation, in the absence of any special agreement in regard thereto; and it has even been held that, where a statute expressly provides that pro rata compensation shall be paid for extra time unless there is an express agreement to the contrary, an employee who has contracted with knowledge of an invariable custom not to pay for overtime and who has signed receipts acknowledging payment of wages from time to time to be in full cannot recover for extra hours of labor.[29] There is, however, authority which holds that an employee who works for longer periods of time than that allowed by law does not thereby forfeit his right to compensation for such periods;[30] and the right to compensation in such a case is sometimes placed on the ground that the law implies a promise on the part of the employer to pay for the extra work.[31] Where, as in the case of public employees, a statute prohibits a city from contracting for extra service, the prohibition is absolute and an employee cannot recover for services rendered beyond the number of hours permitted by the statute;[32] and similarly, where the statute makes the employment of workers for more than a prescribed number of hours a misdemeanor, it is held that the employee is impliedly forbidden to make a contract in excess of such hours, so that he cannot claim an express or implied contract to pay for such excess services rendered.[33]

b. After termination of employment

a. During Employment

Statutes requiring payment of wages to employees at stated periods and imposing penalties for violations have been held valid in some cases. It is sometimes held that statutes requiring the payment of wages at stated times should be liberally construed, except to the extent that such statutes are penal.

Statutes requiring payment of wages to employees at stated periods and imposing a penalty for failure on the part of an employer to comply with such requirements have in some cases been adjudged valid,[34] and in other cases involving similar require-

Employee in pari delicto

An employee, who voluntarily agreed with employer to work overtime in violation of statute limiting hours of work to 48 hours per week, was in pari delicto with the employer and not entitled to recover extra pay for overtime as against contention that she was not in pari delicto because she was a member of the class for whose benefit the statute was enacted, and that the legislature therein treated the employer alone as the perpetrator of the offense and the employee merely as its victim.—Lewis v. Particular statutes or provisions ments have been held invalid.[35] Statutes, requiring the payment of wages at stated periods, which apply only to corporations, have been upheld as properly within the power reserved to the state over corporations,[36] although the statute prohibits the parties contracting otherwise.[37]

It is generally held that a statute requiring employers to pay their employees wages at stated periods is intended to prohibit the employer from entering into contracts of employment containing provisions at variance with such acts,[38] and that any contract made in violation of such a statute is void;[39] but the rule is otherwise where the statute is expressly limited in its operation to cases in which the parties have not otherwise stipulated in the contract of hiring, for the operation of such a statute can be and is entirely avoided by prescribing in the contract the time for payment of wages,[40] and even under a statute containing no such exception it has been held that an employment contract providing for payment at times other than those provided by statute is not void where there was no fraud or concealment by the employer in the execution thereof and it is not injurious to the public welfare.[41]

An agreement between an employer and an employee that the weekly payment of wages shall be provisional, and that fines due for any week shall be deducted from the wages of the week following, is not repugnant to a statute requiring payment of wages at stated periods;[42] nor does such a statute prohibit or make invalid a contract made by a rule of the employer, known or agreed to by the employee, that every person intending to leave the employ must give a prescribed notice of such intention, and that for failure to give such notice and work the prescribed number of days therefor, he shall forfeit whatever wages may be due to him.[43] An employer who does not pay within the required time but withholds payment of his employee's wages until the employee accounts for tools and equipment issued to him is guilty of violating the statute.[44] A statute providing that, in case of a dispute over wages, the employer shall pay within the time specified the amount of wages conceded by him to be due, leaving to the employee his remedies as to the balance, is not applicable where there is no dispute as to wages.[45]

Although the interpretation and application of each statute of this nature must depend on its own particular language,[46] it has been held that the court, in construing such a statute, should be guided more by its purpose than by its phraseology.[47] Some authorities hold that such statutes should be liberally construed,[48] but others, deeming the statute essentially penal in character, require a strict construction;[49] and it has also been held that, as to a statute containing provisions which are both remedial and penal, the penal portion of such an act must be strictly, and the remedial portions liberally, construed.[50] In determining whether an employee is within such a provision it has been held that the designation given to his position or work is not controlling, but the determinative test is whether his compensation comes within the meaning of the term "wages."[51]

In at least one state an employer is liable for the penalty only on a failure or refusal to pay the wages as required by the statute after a demand made on him;[52] hence, unless a request or demand for the payment of such wages is made, a mere agreement entered into not to pay the wages as provided by the statute would not subject the employer to the penalty.[53] There is no refusal to pay within the meaning of the statute where it is shown that the employer paid by check which the employee afterward lost.[54] The penalty imposed by the statute attaches only on failure to pay the wages earned at the time payment is required.[55]

Criminal liability. Under a statute making it a criminal offense to fail to pay wages within the prescribed time, it has been held that intent is not an element of the offense.[56]

Wages "earned"

Statute requiring weekly payment to employees of wages "earned" to date not more than six days preceding pay day refers only to compensation which has been earned by complete performance of work and does not require that such wages shall be "due" or "payable."—Seidenberg v. S. Reduction Co. v. Nussbaum, supra.

(2) Statutory provisions regulating payment of wages of discharged employees see infra subdivision b of this section.

56. N.Y.—People v. Primrose Wet Wash Laundry Co., 11 N.Y.S.2d 302, 256 App.Div. 1088.

(1) In General

A statute providing for prompt payment of an employee's wages on discharge becomes part of the contract of employment and cannot be waived by agreement or custom; but such a statute cannot be extended so as to penalize an employer for acts not contemplated by the statute.

Statutes requiring employers to pay their employees wages due on their discharge, or within a designated time thereafter, and providing a penalty for a violation of their provisions, have been generally held valid.[57] Enactments of this character under some decisions have been upheld in the case of corporations particularly by reason of the power reserved over them by the state as creatures of the state,[58] and it has been held that their operation cannot be extended to individuals;[59] but, where an act applies to both corporations and individuals, the statute will be valid as to corporations when as much of the statute as relates to its operation as applicable to individuals can be eliminated.[60]

The right to a statutory penalty for withholding wages is governed by the law determining the substantive rights of the parties to the contract of employment;[61] and the operation and effect of particular statutes regulating the payment of wages of an employee who is discharged or who quits and imposing penalties for violations is determined by the language used and the usual rules of construction.[62] A statute providing for prompt payment of an employee's earned wages on discharge becomes part of the employment contract;[63] and the employee's rights thereunder cannot be waived or relinquished by contract[64] or deemed to have been waived by custom.[65] So, a statute requiring payment "forthwith" of wages due when the employee ceases to work supersedes a contractual provision for a delay in payment where the employee leaves without notice.[66] However, where the statute permits the parties to fix times for the payment of wages other than those specified in the statute, an agreement in the contract of employment that on discharge the employee's wages shall not be due until some future time or event is not invalid.[67]

Statutes of the character under discussion are intended to compel the employer to pay promptly the regularly earned wages of an employee who was either discharged or who quit of his own accord;[68] they must be given a reasonable,[69] although necessarily strict,[70] construction, and their literal enforcement, it has been held, may yield to strong equitable defenses.[71] Such statutes cannot be employed to penalize an employer for failing to pay an unjust

Deas Co., 118 So. 856, 9 La.App. 47.

Effect of garnishment

Where garnishment proceedings were had against employer who was unconditionally ordered to answer the interrogatories propounded and to pay over to the court any amount due to employee, and employee was advised of the fact and continued to debt[72] or wages other than those earned up to the time of discharge,[73] or for refusing to pay a claim for wages where there is an honest dispute as to the amount due which results in a finding that the employer's figures are correct;[74] nor can such a statute be utilized to preclude the employer's right to interpose any valid counterclaim or defense to the claim of the employee.[75]

The employer is not subject to the penalty from the time of the discharge, where the amount due the employee is not immediately ascertainable or cannot be known by reasonable diligence,[76] or where small items are omitted under an honest mistake, not specifically called to the employer's attention when a demand is made.[77] Under a statute so providing, the penalty attaches only where the employer willfully fails to pay the wages of an employee immediately on his discharge;[78] but it has been held that willful failure means merely that the employer intentionally failed or refused to pay, and not that the refusal was necessarily based on a deliberate evil purpose to defraud the workman of wages which the employer knew to be due.[79] The recovery of a penalty which has accrued up to the date of payment is not barred by an acceptance of payment.[80]

(2) Persons within Statutes; Discharge

The language of the particular statute will determine what persons are affected by it. An employee is discharged or refused further employment when he is refused employment of the same class and kind as that called for in his contract of employment; an employee is not within some statutes as one discharged or refused further employment if he voluntarily leaves his employment.

The question of what persons come within statutes providing for prompt payment of wages after discharge is determined by the language of the particular provision as construed in accordance with the usual rules.[81] Under a statute imposing a pen-work for garnishee and made no effort to have the seizures released, employer's refusal to pay employee the wages due him was not "arbitrary" nor actuated by ill motives and employer could not be held liable for statutory penalties for failure to pay employee by reason of garnishment.—Goodwin v. Southern Kraft Corporation, La.App., 6 So.2d 783.

Employer's ignorance of claims

Employer, who had been sick, was held not liable for penalty for failure to pay discharged employees, where on learning of suits he tried to settle claims immediately.—Deardorf v. Hunter, 106 So. 831, 160 La. 213.

Waiver

Employees, accepting cash for part of wages due and employer's note for balance, waived right to payment within twenty-four hours after discharge precluding employees' assignee from recovering penalties for employer's failure to pay wages due.—Basinger v. Mt. Vernon Oil & Gas Co., 146 So. 32, 176 La. 489.

Future wages

Agreement to await ascertainment

An employee was not entitled to statutory penalty for failure to pay promptly, where employee agreed to wait for his pay until certain records of employer could be checked for compensation and bonus.—Binnion v. M. & D. Drugs, La.App., 8 So.2d 307.

Settlement of accounts

(1) Company when terminating employment justifiably withheld moneys of assistant manager pending settlement of his accounts, and therefore was not subject to statutory penalties.—Williamson v. National Ben. Life Ins. Co., 133 So. 515, 16 La.App. 451.

(2) Where there was no dispute over wages between employers and manager after his discharge, employers were justified in asserting, as a condition of accounting between the parties pursuant to contractual arrangement, whereby manager was to receive profits over a certain amount, that payment of final amount found by them to be due manager should be based on a release by him of any further salary or bonus claims against employers, and therefore manager was not entitled to recover penalty under statutes.—Sayre v. Western Bowl, 174 P.2d 466, 76 Cal. App.2d 793.

Information available to employer

Where information regarding amount of wages actully due employee was equally available to both employer and employee, employer not making payment within seven days after employee's specific demand was liable for statutory penalty.—Cypress Tank Co. v. Weeks, 39 S.W.2d 318, 183 Ark. 891.

Corporations other than railroads

The amendment adding quoted words to statute providing for continuance, until payment, of wages of the employee of a railroad from date of discharge or of refusal longer to employ such employee whose wages have not been paid, etc., "provided further that this act shall apply to all companies and corporations doing business in this state," was intended and did make the penalty apply to all corporations.—Combs v. Bunn W. Robertson, Inc., supra.

Particular persons protected

(1) An employee who is paid by the piece may recover under a statute applicable to laborers for wages.—Champion v. Hermitage Cotton Mills, 82 S.E. 672, 98 S.C. 418.

(2) A superintendent of mine was an "employee" within statute imposing penalty on employer for willful failure to pay wages of employee immediately upon his discharge.—Davis

alty on employers, one who owns property on which work is done, but who is not the employer of the men doing the work, is not liable.[82] A statute of this nature has been held to apply only to regular employees, and not to one who was not on the pay roll of regular employees or given a social security number and who was engaged only to do a specified job in an emergency;[83] on the other hand, a statute which by its terms applies to any person employed "by the hour, day, or week" has been held applicable to casual, odd job, or emergency employment.[84] The right to a penalty is not assignable.[85]

When employee quits the service. It has been held that it is within the police power of the state to enact a penal statute requiring the wages due an employee to be paid at once on his leaving the employment, whether such leaving is by reason of discharge or his quitting the service.[86]

Discharge. An employee is discharged or refused "further employment" within the meaning of the statute when he is refused employment of the same class and kind,[87] and in the same locality in which his wages were earned under the contract of employment.[88] However, where the original employment contemplated a moving from place to place and at wages varying according to the place where the work is done, a moving of the workman from one place to another at a reduced wage is not a refusal to "further employ" within the meaning of the statute.[89] Also an employee does not come within the statute as one discharged or refused further employment if he voluntarily leaves his employment;[90] but, if the employer discontinues paying his employee wages and refuses to pay him wages which have been earned and are due, such conduct constitutes a discharge or refusal further to employ such employee,[91] and the fact that such employee thereafter abandons his job in an effort to obtain other employment from which to make a livelihood does not take him out of the operation of the statute.[92]

The question whether an employee is discharged within the meaning of the statute when he leaves, on being told to do certain work or to quit, depends on whether it was his duty to do the work ordered. If it was his duty his leaving was voluntary; otherwise it was a discharge.[93] If, in such case, it is shown that the minds of the parties never met on the terms of the contract, the employer has the right to make compliance with the order a condition of continued employment, and the employee's refusal to comply is merely a refusal to enter into a contract on those terms, and hence his quitting is voluntary and not a discharge.[94] One whose employment terminates on the completion of the particular job for which he was employed is not discharged or refused further employment within the meaning of the statute.[95] An employer is not bound by the discharge of an employee by a foreman who was not himself in the employ of defendant at the time of the discharge.[96]

(3) Demand and Refusal; Tender

Under some statutes the imposition of the penalty is conditioned on a demand for payment of the wages due or for payment of such wages at a designated place and a refusal or failure to comply with such demand. A proper tender of the wages due at the time of discharge terminates the further accumulation of penalty.

Under some statutes, in order to impose liability on the employer, the employee must establish a proper demand[97] and a refusal to pay.[98] In such case, there can be no recovery of a penalty where the discharged employee after a demand of payment prevents a compliance by his own conduct;[99] nor is there a refusal to pay where a check in payment is given to the employee which he refuses later to present for payment.[1] It has been held that a laborer who demands a greater amount than that due is not entitled to recover penalty wages from the time of such demand,[2] but there is also authority for the view that such a demand is sufficient to subject the employer to liability for the statutory penalty until he makes a proper tender of the amount due, unless the circumstances are such as to excuse a tender,[3] as, for example, where it appears that an offer to pay the amount actually due would have been refused.[4]

Designation of place or station to which wages shall be sent. Under a statute so providing, a discharged employee may demand that the wages due him be mailed or sent to a place designated by him, and, if the employer fails to comply with such demand within the proper time, he becomes liable for penalty wages from the date of discharge;[5] and it has been held that such a provision is not restricted to employees of railroad corporations.[6] In order to recover the penalty, the employee must make a sufficient demand or request;[7] and, in the absence thereof no liability accrues, even though the employee calls repeatedly for his pay at a particular place or station and the employer knows that he has been receiving his pay at that place.[8] However, where the employer or his agent tells the employee that the pay will be ready for him within the statutory time at a station designated by the employer, the employee's acquiescence is equivalent to the request required by statute, and a recovery can be had.[9]

Where the statute so requires, the request should be directed to the foreman or keeper of the employee's time,[10] but an employer is not bound by a request made to a foreman who was not himself in the employ of defendant at the time of such request.[11] A mere complaint to one not designated in the statute as the person on whom demand can be made is not sufficient.[12] Where the statute provides that demand must be made at the place where the employee is usually paid, an employee waives whatever rights he might otherwise have under the statute, by accepting an order for payment of his wages elsewhere.[13]

Tender. A tender of the wages due at the time of the discharge, if properly made and in the proper amount, terminates the further accumulation of penalty,[14] but it does not preclude the employee from recovering the penalty already accrued.[15] A tender is effective for this purpose, even though it does not include the accrued penalty,[16] or the interest, where the amount is so small as to come within the maxim, De minimis non curat lex,[17] or where the employee refuses to accept the tender on other grounds than the failure to include interest,[18] or where it appears that he would still have refused to accept it if it had included the interest.[19] A tender, however, is not effective where made to a justice before the trial in the absence of the employee and his attorney and without their knowledge.[20] A tender of an amount less than the amount of wages due is insufficient to stop the accumulation of "penalty wages".[21]

(4) Amount of Penalty

"Penalty wages" begin to run either from the date of the employee's discharge or from the date of demand for payment depending on the terms of the statute.

Under some statutory provisions "penalty wages" begin running from the date of the employee's discharge, and not merely from the date of the employee's demand for payment,[22] but under others they begin to run only from the time of demand.[23] They stop running on the employer's tender of wages due at the time of the discharge, as discussed supra subdivision b (3) of this section, or on the commencement of an action to collect, where the action is brought within the time allowed for a maximum recovery,[24] or on the entry of final judgment in such action after appeal where the statute permits a recovery up to the entry of judgment.[25] The pending of a valid garnishment proceeding against the employer for any portion of the penalty period following the discharge of the employee arrests the running of the penalty,[26] and, if the proceedings are dismissed before the termination of the penalty period, the amount of penalty recoverable is computed for the entire penalty period minus the wages for the time such proceedings were pending.[27] It has been held that the penalty may properly be limited to the time prior to the day on which the employer was placed in receivership.[28]

§ 157. Medium of Payment

Under constitutional and statutory provisions in some jurisdictions employers are required to pay wages for work done only in lawful money or in scrip, tokens, or other evidences of debt which comply with the terms of the statute.

Under the constitutional and statutory provisions of some states wage earners are required to be paid for their labor in lawful money,[29] and such a provision has been held to cover payment of wages at any time, whether the payment is partial or entire.[30] Statutes of this nature have generally been held valid;[31] their purpose is to protect the laborer[32] against the coercion and demand of his employer that he accept in payment of his wages less than the purchasing power of the dollar.[33] It has accordingly been held that the employee cannot waive, by contract or otherwise, the protection thus afforded him,[34] and in some states it is expressly so provided by statute;[35] but there is also authority for the view that a statute requiring the payment of wages in lawful currency may be waived by the employee,[36] as by a contract that the amount due on a store account shall be taken from future wages.[37]

A statute making it unlawful to pay otherwise than in lawful currency or specifically to issue scrip or trade or time checks in payment for work done by employees does not apply to time checks issued, not as payment for work, but merely as a statement of account or an acknowledgment of the amount due;[38] nor does it apply to a check which shows itself on its face to be payable in lawful money and redeemable without discount in cash[39] or to a check issued as a credit and not in payment of wages already earned.[40] Unless the statute otherwise provides, the requirement that employees be paid in lawful money does not prevent an employee from assigning any portion of his wages as security for a store account that he is running up with a merchant[41] in the absence of collusion to do what the law has forbidden;[42] nor does such a requirement prevent an arrangement whereby checkoff orders are signed by union members directing the employer to deduct from their wages union dues and assessments[43] or an arrangement whereby the employer deducts a portion of an employee's wages and applies it to the purchase price of stock pursuant to the employee's written order.[44] Where the statute so provides, the scrip is payable only in cash, notwithstanding the terms of the scrip purport to make it payable in merchandise.[45]

While the mere issuance of checks or coupons against wages not yet earned does not violate the law requiring payment of wages in lawful currency,[46] if such coupons or checks are made payable otherwise than in cash for the full face value at the time the wages become due, or if the employer refuses so to redeem them at such time, the law is violated;[47] and, under some statutes expressly so providing, any checks, punchouts, tickets, tokens, or other device, redeemable by its terms either partially or wholly in goods or merchandise, must be redeemed by the employer issuing them on demand of any legal holder thereof on the next pay day after issuance for full face value in lawful money.[48] It is immaterial by whom the order or check is issued or put in circulation if it is of a character made unlawful by the statute and is used by the employer for the payment of labor.[49] Conversely, if the order is payable in lawful currency, its legal character is not affected by the fact that it is an order on a third person to pay the specified sum.[50]

A statute prohibiting the making of a contract for the payment of wages otherwise than in lawful currency does not preclude the parties from making an accord and satisfaction after wages have been earned and services rendered.[51] A provision regulating the assignment of future wages by an employee does not render discounts made by an em-

"What was the mischief that this statute was intended to remedy? It was not the giving of credit to the laborer between pay days. Scrip issued for both purposes Where scrip issued by coal company to its employees had been issued in part as wages, and in part as an accommodation to employees to whom company was not indebted but who were thereby entitled to credit at company's store, merchant who had acquired scrip was entitled to recover face value of that portion which had been issued as wages, but not of that portion representing an advance of credit.—Henley v. Liability of employer and trader ployer in making payments to employees at their request before pay day illegal.[52]

Transferability of scrip. Under some statutes trade checks or store orders issued against wages to become due and redeemable by the employer issuing them are held to be redeemable in the hands of a bona fide holder at face value;[53] such orders in the hands of holders for value are presumed to be based on an adequate consideration.[54] The fact that such an order declares on its face that it is not transferable does not prevent a bona fide holder recovering its face value from the person or corporation issuing it.[55] Under some statutory provisions scrip, trade checks, or other evidence of debt for labor are expressly made transferable;[56] that is to say, a right to redeem such scrip at face value is given to any person presenting it for payment at the proper time and on compliance with the statutory conditions, even though the person presenting it is neither the laborer to whom such scrip was issued nor the person who bought it from him.[57]

It has been held that such a scrip law making scrip issued by an employer transferable must be fairly construed so as to carry out its purpose[58] and must be read into every item of scrip issued.[59] A provision in such a statute that one who paid cash for scrip in an amount less than the full face value shall, on redemption, receive only what he paid, the balance to be credited to the worker to whom the scrip was issued, does not affect the right of a buyer to recover the full amount where he has paid par in merchandise for it.[60]

A statute providing for redemption in cash at face value of transferable scrip issued against wages to become due conforms to a constitutional requirement that wage earners be paid for their labor in lawful money;[61] but such a constitutional requirement is violated by a statute permitting the issuance of non-transferable scrip or tokens representing an advance-

Records to be kept by purchaser

(1) The statute requires the purchaser of scrip to keep an accurate record of the amount of scrip purchased, the name of each person from whom it was purchased, the date, and the amount paid, and who issued the scrip so purchased; and a sworn statement incorporating these items must be presented when payment for the scrip is demanded.—Elkhorn Piney Coal Mining Co. v. Elvove, 36 S.W.2d 3, 237 Ky. 570.

(2) Substantial compliance with such provisions is sufficient.—Clear Fork Coal Co. v. Robertson, 148 S.W. 2d 1047, 285 Ky. 659—Elkhorn Piney Coal Mining Co. v. Elvove, supra.

(3) The statements need not show whether the scrip was paid for in money, goods, or other things of value.—Elkhorn Piney Coal Mining Co. v. Elvove, supra.

(4) If the purchaser acquired the scrip from one other than the employee to whom it was issued, the statement need not show the name of such employee.—Elkhorn Piney Coal Mining Co. v. Elvove, supra—Western Kentucky Coal Co. v. Nall & Bailey, 14 S.W.2d 400, 228 Ky. 76.

When statement unnecessary

(1) Purchaser of scrip issued by employer was not required to present itemized statement and affidavit where employer's manager refused payment on ground that employer was not redeeming scrip in cash.—Hoskins Grocery Co. v. Creech Coal Co., 56 S.W.2d 555, 247 Ky. 8—Elkhorn Piney Coal Mining Co. v. Elvove, 36 S.W.2d 3, 237 Ky. 570.

(2) In such case defendant was chargeable with a constructive knowledge of the law and must be deemed to have waived right to require presentation of statements.—Barker v. Stearns Coal & Lumber Co., 163 S.W.2d 466, 291 Ky. 184.

Time of presentation

It was coal company's duty to redeem scrip issued to employees when presented by purchaser from third person on regular pay day.—Hoskins Grocery Co. v. Creech Coal Co., 56 S.W.2d 555, 247 Ky. 8.

Interest

Under express provision in the statute, where the purchaser of scrip has paid for it in cash he is entitled on redemption to interest at the statutory rate to the date of presentation of the scrip for payment, and the amount of such interest is chargeable to the employee to whom the scrip was issued; where the purchaser paid for the scrip not in cash but in merchandise, he is not entitled to interest to the date of presentation but he is entitled to interest from the time of proper presentation, demand, and refusal.—Carrs Fork Coal Co. v. ment of wages earned but not yet due,[62] although it would not be violated by a provision authorizing the issuance of nontransferable scrip or tokens as an extension of credit based on an anticipated counter-obligation or unearned wages or anything other than wages earned.[63] Under a statute so providing, an employer may issue nontransferable scrip redeemable in merchandise only until pay day, at which time it must be redeemed in cash, provided such scrip is issued only against wages for labor to be performed and not in payment of wages already earned,[64] and if the scrip purports to cover both labor performed and labor to be performed the statutory proviso is not satisfied, and the scrip will be held payable only in cash.[65]

What law governs. A contract providing for the payment by promissory notes payable from the proceeds of the employer's business, lawful in the state where made and where the services were performed, will be enforced against the employee suing on an implied contract in a state of which plaintiff is a resident, although similar contracts are made illegal by the statutes of such latter state.[66]

Recovery. Some statutes expressly make employers who issue scrip to employees by way of payment for labor liable on proper and timely demand of a holder thereof for the full face value of such scrip, together with interest from the date of demand[67] and attorney's fees.[68] Where an employer issued scrip payable in merchandise to strangers as well as to employees, a holder of the scrip seeking to recover under such a statute must show that his scrip was originally issued to employees.[69] A statutory imposition of a penalty in addition to a reasonable attorney's fee on recovery of judgment in a suit for redemption of scrip has been held mandatory;[70] and, if the employer flatly refuses to redeem scrip without asking for an opportunity to inspect it, he cannot escape liability for the penalty on the ground that the scrip was presented to him in batches so that he had no opportunity to inspect.[71] Some statutes make violations thereof a criminal offense;[72] and it has been held that such statutes should be strictly construed in favor of defendant and against the state.[73]

§ 158. Basis and Measure of Compensation

In a number of jurisdictions the methods for determining the compensation of workers engaged in certain occupations in which such determination is difficult are prescribed by statute, and such a statute has been held valid.

Statutes prescribing reasonable rules for determining the compensation of workers in occupations where such determination is difficult have been held valid as within the proper exercise of police power.[74] Thus, under some statutory provisions, the compensation of hop pickers is required to be determined solely by the weight of the hops picked,[75] and the compensation of miners is in some jurisdictions regulated by statutes providing for the mode of weighing the ore mined.[76] Since such statutes

However, if it represents wages owing a laborer for work done, the legislative authority is subject to the restriction . . . of the Constitution."—Barker v. Stearns Coal & Lumber Co., supra.

Scrip issued under such a statute, if issued for wages earned, is transferable even though by its terms it is declared nontransferable.—Barker v. Stearns Coal & Lumber Co., 163 S.W.2d 466, 291 Ky. 184—Barker v. Stearns Coal & Lumber Co., 152 S.W. 2d 953, 287 Ky. 340.

63. Ky.—Barker v. Stearns Coal & Lumber Co., 152 S.W.2d 953, 287 Ky. 340.

Reason for rule

Extension of credit by employer to an employee, based on anticipated service and contingent security, is not payment of wages within constitutional provision requiring payment in lawful money, but such extension is matter of contract between parties which is not controlled by such constitutional provision.—Barker v. Stearns Coal & Lumber Co., 152 S.W. 2d 953, 287 Ky. 340.

Nature of obligation created

Scrip issued and accepted for purposes other than wages constitute duebills or promises to pay according to their terms, coupled with general custom in relation thereto—Barker v. Stearns Coal & Lumber Co., 163 S.W.2d 466, 291 Ky. 184.

are penal, they are as a rule to be strictly construed.[77] A statute of this character has been held not to prevent the making of a contract for payment of wages on a different basis[78] and does not apply where a contract exists between an operator and his employers for the payment of wages on a different basis than by weight,[79] but a mere custom as to weighing cannot abrogate the specific provisions of a statute.[80]

A statute requiring the weighing of all coal before it is screened, qualified by a proviso that the act shall not be so construed as to compel payment for impurities, does not preclude a screening before weighing where the mine owner can only by that means avoid paying for impurities;[81] and a statute requiring every mine owner to pay his employees for the different grades into which the coal may be divided, at such prices as may be agreed on by the respective parties, does not prohibit the mine owner from contracting with his employee to pay only for one grade of coal screened and nothing for the others.[82]

Checkweighman. Under statute in some jurisdictions, miners in proper cases may employ a checkweighman to inspect the weights and see that all coal mined is weighed and properly accounted for.[83] There must be substantial compliance with provisions in such a statute governing the manner in which the weighman shall be selected in order to impose on the mine owner the duty of permitting the weighman to use the mine premises;[84] but such a statute has been held not to preclude the selection of the weighman by other than the statutory methods if there is no objection by the mine owner to the method adopted.[85] Where the statute makes the employment of a weighman by the miners optional with them, it is not unlawful for the mine owners and miners to contract to work without enforcing such right.[86] Furthermore, under such a statute, although a checkweighman has been selected as allowed by law, a mine owner is under no obligation to continue to operate the mine,[87] and a threat by him to close down the mine unless one so selected is discharged is not, in the absence of fraud, such interference or intimidation, within the meaning of the statute, as to constitute an offense.[88]

§ 159. Deduction and Forfeiture

Statutes prohibiting deductions from wages in certain cases, or except in compliance with prescribed conditions, are generally held valid, and, being penal, should be strictly construed; in a number of jurisdictions, by virtue of express statutory provision, persons are forbidden to require employees to "kick back" any part of their wages in order to obtain or retain employment.

An act forbidding an employer to impose a fine on an employee or to withhold wages because of imperfections in the work done by him has been held unconstitutional;[89] but it would seem that such a statute would be constitutional if construed to mean merely that an employer is forbidden arbitrarily to impose a penalty for an imperfection by a deduction from the amount of the wages to which the employee is entitled under his contract, whether that amount has been determined by quantum meruit or by stipulation.[90] Statutes prohibiting deduction from wages for defective workmanship unless mutually determined to be the result of the employee's negligence or willful conduct[91] or prohibiting deduction from wages of dues payable to labor organizations[92] have been held valid. Generally speaking, the operation and effect of statutes prohibiting deductions under certain circumstances depends on the particular language employed as construed in accordance with the usual rules.[93] Since such statutes are penal in nature, they must be strictly construed.[94]

Under some statutes a penalty is imposed on an employer who makes deductions from wages in violation of their terms.[95] A statute providing that any person who shall withhold any part of the wages of an employee, because of an agreement requiring notice before leaving the employment, shall be subject to a penalty does not apply to a contract of employment by which each party agrees to give the other two weeks' notice of intention to terminate it, and in default of such notice to forfeit or pay two weeks' wages.[96] A statute requiring payment without deduction, on the discharge of an employee, means without discount for paying in advance of the time fixed by the contract, and does not prevent the corporation from offsetting the damages sustained by the employee's failure to perform his contract.[97] When the parties have stipulated that either may terminate a contract of employment if he sees proper to do so, the forfeiture provided by statute in case the employee shall depart from the service before the expiration of the term will not be incurred in such a case.[98] A statute prohibiting deductions from wages for defective workmanship, unless mutually determined to result from the employee's negligence, becomes part of the contract of employment and is binding on the parties.[99] Under a statute prohibiting the imposition of a fine on an employee unless the amount thereof is agreed on between the parties, an employee may, by acquiescence in similar conduct, expressly agree that, when he has been paid in full for one week's work, fines for the imperfections of that week may be deducted from the succeeding week's wages,[1] and, as discussed supra § 156, such an agreement is not contrary to a statute requiring employers to pay their employees weekly.

"Kick-back" statutes. Purpose of statute

(1) The purpose of the Kick-Back Racket Act is to protect not only the legal form of employment contracts, but the substantive rights of workers to receive the benefit of wage schedules provided by congress, except where diverted under authority of law or the workers' voluntary agreements.—U. S. v. Laudani, N.J., 64 S.Ct. 315, 320 U.S. 543, 88 L.Ed. 300, 149 A.L.R. 492.

(2) The purpose of the Anti-Kickback Act is to insure that workers

utes are made criminal offenses.[3] Such statutes have been held valid[4] and, being penal, should be strictly construed,[5] although it has also been held that such a statute must be read and applied in the light of the evils which gave rise to its enactment and the aims it sought to achieve[6] and that its effectiveness should not be limited unless the legislative intent to so limit it is inescapable.[7]

The operation and effect of such statutes generally depend on their language and terms.[8] The statute may by its terms be made applicable not only to individuals, associations, or corporations engaged in private business, but also to an elected public official who is authorized to appoint or hire another person for a municipality or governmental agency.[9] While such a statute necessarily applies where the employee gives up or concedes a portion of his contractual wage to, or in favor of, or at the instance of, the employer or one acting for or on behalf of the employer,[10] it is not limited to such cases[11] and on federal projects shall receive the full wages to which they are entitled from their employers, many of whom might be found to be depriving the workers of their rights in such respect.—U. S. v. Carbone, Mass., 66 S.Ct. 734, 327 U.S. 633, 90 L.Ed. 904.

(3) The purpose of the statute is to protect workmen engaged on public projects from being compelled, through means stated in the statute, to give up any part of the compensation to which they are entitled under their contract of employment.—U. S. v. Fuller, D.C.N.Y., 51 F.Supp. 951—U. S. v. McGraw, D.C.N.Y., 47 F.Supp. 927—U. S. v. Charlick, D.C. Pa., 26 F.Supp. 203.

8. U.S.—U. S. v. Carbone, Mass., 66 S.Ct. 734, 327 U.S. 633, 90 L.Ed. 904.

Nature of acts prohibited

(1) The statute does not undertake to prescribe any particular rate of wage, nor does it provide that payment of a lower wage than the parties have agreed on will constitute a crime; it is directed only against those who procure a refund under threats, express or implied, that the employee will be discharged.—People v. Brill, 7 N.Y.S.2d 949, 255 App.Div. 452.

(2) The "kick-back" statute is violated whenever employee is in essence deprived by employer of part of the prevailing wage agreed on, irrespective of how deprivation is effected or of whether money deducted was ever in employee's possession.—People, on Complaint of Falzia v. Meyer, 3 N.Y.S.2d 870, 167 Misc. 287.

(3) It is not necessary to constitute a rebate, within meaning of statute prohibiting the rebating of wages as applied to public officials and employees, that money returned or withheld from employees' wages be returned to the coffers of the public agency involved; it is sufficient if such moneys go into pocket of elected public official who has authority to appoint and to remove the employee.—State v. Carter, 142 P.2d 403, 18 Wash.2d 590.

Contractual wage protected

(1) The offense aimed at by the Kick-Back Racket Act is the inducing of an employee engaged on public work, financed in whole or in part by the United States, to give up any part of his compensation to which he is entitled under his contract of employment, which means the contract between the employee and his employer.—U. S. v. Laudani, C.C.A.N.J., 134 F.2d 847, reversed on other grounds 64 S.Ct. 315, 320 U.S. 543, 88 L.Ed. 300, 149 A.L.R. 492—U. S. v. Charlick, D.C.Pa., 26 F.Supp. 203—U. S. v. Golder, D.C.Pa., 11 F. Supp. 870.

(2) The statute is not violated where the employee receives the whole amount of the wages called for by his contract with the employer, even though the amount of such wages is less than the general wage scale fixed by the government or less than the wages fixed by the employer's contract with the government or with the general contractor, and regardless of what means were used to induce the employee to accept such lower rate of pay.—U. S. v. Charlick, supra—U. S. v. Golder, supra.

Employee as accomplice

A workman who, induced by fear that work will otherwise cease, consents to arrangement violative of "kick-back" statute, cannot be regarded as an accomplice, but a workman who, in addition to returning part of his own wages, assists employer in violating "kick-back" statute by collecting "kick backs" from other workmen is guilty as an accomplice.—People, on Complaint of Falzia v. Meyer, 3 N.Y.S.2d 870, 167 Misc. 287.

Contractual provisions required

Prior to its amendment, a statute making it a crime to require employees to pay back or return any part of their wages applied only where there was a contract for personal services between the employer and the employees or their union requiring the employees to be paid the prevailing rate of wages.—People v. Brill, 7 N.Y.S.2d 949, 255 App.Div. 452.

has been held applicable to a foreman having the authority to hire and fire employees even though he was acting solely on his own behalf.[12]

Such statutes have also been held applicable to union officials who extort from workmen, not union members, part of their compensation for the privilege of working,[13] but other statutory provisions of this character have been held not to apply to union officials who threaten to procure the discharge of any workers failing to make the required weekly payments until the full amount of union initiation fees is paid in accordance with the union's closed-shop agreement with the employer.[14] A statute prohibiting the rebating of wages has been held not to forbid the making of donations or contributions by the employees to the employer, whether the employer is engaged in private industry or is an elected public official, provided such contribution or donation is voluntary.[15] It has been held that payments made under a "kick-back" condition in a contract of employment are recoverable as payments made under duress.[16]

C. Actions and Criminal Prosecutions

§ 160(1). Action for Wages, Damages, or Penalties

a. In general

b. Under Fair Labor Standards Act

a. In General

The nature, form, and scope of actions for wages and penalties under statutes regulating wages and the payment thereof depend on the terms and provisions of the statute and the circumstances of the case.

The nature, form, and scope of actions for wages and penalties under statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof, which statutes are discussed supra §§ 151 (1)–159, depend on the terms and provisions of the particular statute and the circumstances of the particular case.[17] Where a statute provides for the payment of overtime pay, it is immaterial that it makes no provision for the recovery of such pay, since such provision carries with it by necessary implication the right to sue and recover such overtime compensation.[18] However, under a statute providing that an employee working an excessive number of hours shall be entitled to recover compensation at the legal minimum rate for the overtime worked, but failing to set a minimum wage, it has been held that an employee has no cause of action for overtime worked.[19] Under statutes imposing a penalty for a failure, on the part of an employer, to make payment of wages to his employees at stated periods, considered supra § 156, an action may be brought to recover the penalty alone[20] or to recover the wages and accrued penalty.[21]

Employee barred from union

The statute penalizing the compelling of workmen on public work to give up part of their compensation by threats of procuring dismissal from employment is violated by an agreement between an employer's authorized agent and union officials whereby workers are compelled to pay a part of their compensation to a local union of which they were not and could not become members, for the privilege of working on a war project, the statute not being limited to employers in view of the words "anyone" in the title, and "whoever" in the text, having such universally understood meanings that they are embodied in the maxim, Expressum facit cessare tacitum.—U. S. v. Fuller, D.C.N.Y., 51 F.Supp. 951.

Subsequent conversion of money

Where acts of union officials in threatening to procure discharge of any workers failing to make required weekly payments until full amount of union initiation fees was paid in accordance with union's closed-shop agreement with employer were not in violation of the Anti-Kickback Act, proof that union officials thereafter converted money so collected to their own use in violation of the union rules, if established, would not constitute a violation of the act.—U. S. v. Carbone, Mass., 66 S.Ct. 734, 327 U.S. 633, 90 L.Ed. 904.

15. Wash.—State v. Carter, 142 P. 2d 403, 407, 18 Wash.2d 590.

"While occasion for the manifestation of such generosity on the part of the employee may not be frequent nor the privilege often exercised, there is nothing in the statute which proscribes such efforts. Having once received his wages in full, the employee is at liberty to do what he will with his earnings, so long as he does not violate some positive rule of law governing his action. He may keep the money in his pocket, invest it, spend it, or give it away. . . . If the contribution be in fact a voluntary donation, it does not necessarily constitute a rebate of wages merely because it moves to, or for the benefit of, the employer."—State v. Carter, supra.

21. Ark.—Morgan v. St. Louis, I. M.

Actions for wages apart from statute are considered supra §§ 122–137.

Statutes as to public employees and employees on public works. The provisions of a statute requiring prevailing wages to be maintained in the construction of public works, and providing for fines, imprisonment, and forfeitures for violations of the statute, have been held not exclusive, and employees, as third-party beneficiaries of the statute, may maintain a civil action against their employer for the difference between the wages actually paid and the wages due under prevailing wage rates.[22] Under a provision requiring contracts between governmental agencies and contractors on public works to provide for the payment of prevailing wages to employees on such public works, and providing the remedy for the employees' recovery of the differential in wages, it has been held that the employee cannot sue on the contract but must follow the statutory remedy, which is exclusive;[23] but where the contract with the governmental agency contained an agreement to pay not merely prevailing wages, but definite wages as set forth in a schedule annexed to the contract, an employee of the contractor may maintain a common-law action against his employer for breach of such contract, and the statutory remedy is not exclusive in such case.[24]

Where a statute providing for the payment of prevailing wages to public employees provides the remedy whereby an employee may recover the difference between the wages paid and the amount which should have been paid at the prevailing rate, such remedy has been held exclusive and it must be followed by employees.[25]

b. Under Fair Labor Standards Act

An action under the Fair Labor Standards Act for unpaid minimum wages or overtime compensation and liquidated damages is an action to enforce a civil liability and may be brought only by an aggrieved employee. The remedies established by the act are exclusive; but, if the action is brought in a state court, such court's rules of practice and procedure control.

An action under the Fair Labor Standards Act to recover unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation, and an additional equal amount as liquidated damages, is an action to enforce a civil liability, not a penal liability,[26] although the breach complained of also constitutes a criminal violation.[27] It is an action for wages due under an employment agreement,[28] an action created by statute on a contract, obligation, or liability.[29] The remedies established by the act for its enforcement are exclusive and not subject to exception;[30] and the right to recover for back wages must be enforced in the manner expressly specified in the act.[31] However, if the action is brought in a state court it must be tried

The statute requiring prevailing wage rate to be maintained in construction of public works contemplates authority of workmen to enforce their rights to be paid wages prescribed by suit against contractor in view of purpose of statute and other statutes enacted for benefit of workmen furnishing labor on public works, all of which statutes are in pari materia.—Austin Bridge Co. v. Teague, supra.

Reason for rule

"The obligation thus assumed by the contractor is precise, and extends beyond the scope of the statutory obligation. The statutory remedy provided for breach of the statutory obligation would be an inadequate and unsuitable remedy for a violation of this contractual obligation. An intention that the statutory remedy should be used for violation of the contractual obligation cannot be read into the statute by any reasonable construction. It would, indeed, render futile the contractual obligation."—Fata v. S. A. Healy Co., supra.

Suit against joint employers

An employee has been held entitled to recover a claim under the act from joint employers notwithstanding the act does not specifically so provide.—Ashenford v. L. Yukon & Sons Produce Co., 172 S.W.2d 881, 237 Mo.App. 1241.

in accordance with the rules of practice and procedure of such state court.[32]

While the action is one to enforce a private or individual right,[33] it is one in which the public has a decided interest;[34] and public policy demands that the employee's exercise of his right to maintain suit under the act be not unnecessarily hampered.[35] Accordingly the right of an aggrieved employee to maintain an action for back wages, as granted by the act, includes not only the right to initiate it, but also the right to prosecute it to final judgment;[36] and once the action has been commenced, whether as a consolidation of claims of several employees or as an action by a designated agent on behalf of others, it may be maintained in such manner until final judgment is entered.[37] The action inures only to employees having grievances against their employers[38] and is the only one that an employee may maintain.[39] On the other hand, the administrator of the wage and hour division of the department of labor is not authorized to sue for the wages of employees under the act,[40] his authority in the enforcement of the act being limited to suit for injunction[41] and to procurement, through the United States attorney, of criminal proceedings in the name of the United States.[42]

Discovery. The rules relating to the propriety of interrogatories in civil actions generally, considered in Discovery §§ 55–68, have been held to apply in actions under the Fair Labor Standards Act.[43]

§ 160(2). —— Jurisdiction

Jurisdiction of actions to recover wages and penalties pursuant to statute generally depends on the terms of the statute.

Jurisdiction of an action to recover wages and penalties under statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof generally depends on the terms of the statute.[44] Thus it has been held that in enforcing the minimum wage rates under a statute the court exercises special, limited, statutory jurisdiction,[45] so that where conditions precedent prescribed by the statute, discussed infra § 160 (3), are not complied with the court is without jurisdiction of the action.[46]

43. Objections to interrogatories denied
In employees' action against employer for portal-to-portal pay under the Fair Labor Standards Act employer's objection that employees' interrogatory relating to hours worked and compensation paid was too broad and sought irrelevant information would be overruled, except in so far as inquiry related to period in which recovery was barred by limitations; and employer's objection that compilation of answers to employees' interrogatory relating to hours worked and compensation paid, necessitated large expenditures of time and money by employer was not sustained, where employer in making its own investigation would in a large measure gather together the information called for in the interrogatory.—Adelman v. Nordberg Mfg. Co., D.C.Wis., 6 F.R.D. 383.
Objection to interrogatory sustained
Since there is no reason why defendant should be required to answer an interrogatory prior to the time it has determined on its defenses, the objection in such case that plaintiff's interrogatory relating to hours worked and compensation paid is premature will be sustained.—Adelman v. Nordberg Mfg. Co., supra.

Where commissioner of labor had not filed with the clerk of the superior court as required by statute the record of hearing before the wage board together with its report, findings and determinations as filed with the commissioner, and his certificate of service thereof on each employer in the state of whom he had information or record, superior court was without jurisdiction to entertain an action to enforce minimum fair wage rates established for such industry.—Stinson v. Taylor, 27 A.2d 400, 139 Me. 97.
Two months' violation
In action by commissioner of labor to enforce minimum fair wage rates established by wage board, where record did not show that any employer in such industry failed for two months or at all to pay established wages after service of board's report, but showed that action was brought within month after report was filed and served, justice of superior court was without jurisdiction and proceedings were nullity.—Stinson v. Taylor, 17 A.2d 760, 137 Me. 332.

Lack of jurisdiction cannot be waived by the parties.[47]

Under Fair Labor Standards Act. Under a section of the Fair Labor Standards Act providing that an action for wages or penalties may be maintained in any court of competent jurisdiction, it has been held that the action may be brought in such a court, whether state or federal.[48]

§ 160(3). —— Conditions Precedent

In actions to enforce statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof, there must be at least a substantial compliance with conditions precedent prescribed by the statute.

Where a statute regulating wages or the payment thereof prescribes conditions under which it may be enforced and penalties recovered, there must be at least substantial compliance with such conditions as a prerequisite to the right to recover under the statute.[49] Thus it has been held a condition precedent to an action for minimum wages that the classification and wage of the employee involved must have been fixed.[50] Under a minimum wage statute so providing, it is a condition precedent to an action by the commissioner of labor to enforce the rates established that the rates were served on the employer and that the employer failed for two months to pay such rates;[51] and these conditions precedent cannot be changed by the consent of the parties.[52]

Public employees; employees on public works. Where an employee of a contractor engaged in public work seeks to pursue the statutory remedy in enforcing his right to recover the difference between the wage paid and the prevailing wage, his compliance with the statute is a condition precedent to his right to bring such action.[53] Thus, where a statute, which provides a right and a remedy for the recovery of the difference between the sum actually paid to a public employee and the amount which should have been paid at the prevailing rate of wages, expressly so provides, it is a condition precedent to the maintenance of such action that the employee shall have applied for the fixing of the prevailing rate of wages[54] by filing a verified complaint with the proper officer.[55] On the other hand, one who has filed a verified complaint becomes a party to the proceed-

Demand for redemption of tokens

Mediation condition held inapplicable
Under statute pertaining to deductions for faulty workmanship, there can be no disagreement as to cause of a defect in a piece of work which would require the mediation of the industrial commission before the bringing of a suit to recover double the deduction until the matter has been the subject of consideration at a conference between employee, or his representative, and employer to determine the cause, and in absence of such conference employee is free to sue for double the amount of deductions.—Peters v. Fire telegraph dispatchers in New York City fire department were not entitled to maintain action to recover difference between wages received by them and amount allegedly due under prevailing rate of wages, where they had not complied with statutory procedure requiring fixation of prevailing rate by city comptroller as condition precedent to commencement of action.—McGrail v. City of New York, supra.

Persons affected
The clause "the complainant or any other person affected," in statute authorizing the complainant or any other person affected to institute an action against a person violating statute relating to hours and wages for public work for the difference between wages paid and wages which should have been paid, does not include a person who did not file a verified complaint with the fiscal officer; and, where order of comptroller of the City of New York determining prevailing wages for wiremen in the city resulted from a statutory investigation conducted by comptroller after city wiremen not including plaintiff had filed with the comptroller verified complaints relating to prevailing wages of wiremen, and plaintiff subsequently filed a verified complaint with the comptroller, plaintiff antecedent to the order was not a "person affected" within the statute and was not entitled to recover the difference between the wages paid for his services and the amount which should have been paid under the order.—Campbell v. City of New York, supra.

ing to fix the prevailing wage rate and is entitled to avail himself of the benefits thereof;[56] and he is entitled to recover the difference in wages from the time of the filing of the original verified complaint by which the proceeding to fix the prevailing wage was instituted.[57]

Failure to pay on termination of employment. In an action by an employee to enforce a statute providing penalties for the failure of an employer to pay wages due at the time of the termination of the employment, it is a condition precedent, where the statute so provides, that the employee make a proper demand for payment[58] and designate the place for payment.[59]

Under Fair Labor Standards Act. It is not a condition precedent to an action for unpaid minimum wages or overtime compensation and liquidated damages, under the Fair Labor Standards Act, that the employee make a demand on the employer for payment of the additional compensation claimed to be due.[60] Also it has been held not a condition precedent to such actions that the employee return sums received under a settlement if he did not receive all that was owing to him:[61] and a provision in a settlement agreement making the return of sums received a condition precedent to such action has been held invalid.[62]

§ 160(4). —— Time to Sue, Limitations, and Laches

A cause of action under statutes regulating wages accrues when the employer becomes liable for payment of that which the act requires. Limitations expressly provided for in the statute control; and actions under the Fair Labor Standards Act are subject to state statutes of limitation.

A cause of action under statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof accrues to an employee when the employer becomes liable for payment of that which the act requires.[63] Accordingly an action for additional wages and liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act accrues at the end of each regular pay period.[64]

Limitations. Where a statute regulating wages or the payment thereof expressly provides a period of limitation for an action to enforce it, such provision is controlling.[65] While as far as the Fair Labor Standards Act itself is concerned, an employee may sue his employer thereunder at any time,[66] where a state statute provides a limitation period on actions for the recovery of overtime pay or premium pay, accrued or accruing, including penalties required or authorized by statute, such limitation period has been held to apply to actions for overtime and liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act;[67] and an action for additional compensation and liquidated damages under the act has also been held subject to a state statute of limitation expressly providing a period of limitation on actions for wages or for a liability for failure to pay wages[68] even though the cause of action was already in existence at the time of the enactment of the limitations statute.[69] The fact that the liability of one joint employer under the act for additional compensation is barred by limitations will not affect the other joint employer's liability which is not so barred.[70]

Laches. An action to enforce a statute regulating wages or the payment thereof,[71] such as the Fair Labor Standards Act,[72] may be barred by laches.

§ 160(5). —— Defenses

a. In general
b. Actions under Fair Labor Standards Act

a. In General

In order to constitute a good defense to an action under a statute regulating wages, the matter must be germane and must present a legal reason why the plaintiff should not recover.

In general, for matters to constitute a good defense to an action under a statute regulating wages or the payment thereof, they must be germane to the cause of action and must present a legal reason why plaintiff should not recover.[73] In actions by an employee for a statutory penalty for the failure to pay wages to the employee on his discharge or within a designated time thereafter, the employer may interpose an equitable defense against the penalty.[74] The employer may show in defense that the employee has signed vouchers acknowledging payment in full for the services for which he claims payment[75] or that the employee agreed with his foreman on an extension of time for the payment of the balance due him and that suit for the penalty was brought before the time had elapsed;[76] but it has been held not a defense that the discharged employee was still living in a house furnished him by his employer.[77]

b. Actions under Fair Labor Standards Act

Good faith of the employer has been held not a defense to an action for overtime compensation and liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

In general, in order for matters to constitute a good defense to an action for additional compensation and liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act, they must be germane to the cause of action and must present a legal reason why plaintiff should not recover.[78] Accordingly, in an action to

Statute subject to special scrutiny

Where a state statute of limitations relating to actions for the recovery of wages is enacted subsequent to the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act such state statute should receive careful scrutiny as to its intent and scope.—Reid v. Solar Corp., supra.

Employment contract violative of statute

The fact that employment contract was itself violative of statute prohibiting withholding of employees' wages for over six days would be no defense to employee's action for wages.—La Juett v. Coty Mach. Co., supra.

Shortage in employee's accounts

Where company hired route foreman who agreed to pay for all shortage that might occur in the accounts of the drivers and at time of discharge shortage in accounts existed, employer's refusal to pay amount claimed by foreman as wages at time of discharge because of shortage was justified and constituted sufficient equitable ground to refuse the allowance of penalties provided for by statute.—Yancey v. Dickson Ice Cream Co., La.App., 190 So. 837.

Matters held to constitute defense

A defense of payment in full of the amount required to be paid by the act is sufficient.—Caperna v. Williams-Bauer Corporation, 47 N.Y.S.2d 328.

Matters held not to constitute defense

(1) The fact that the employer is in financial difficulties and would be rendered insolvent if it complied with the statute is not a defense.—Torres v. American R. Co. of Porto Rico, C.C.A.Puerto Rico, 157 F.2d 255.

(2) It is not a defense that plaintiff might have anticipated bringing action while still in defendant's employ, even to point of gathering evienforce the minimum wage provisions of the act, it is no defense that the employees received more after the act was passed than they received before;[79] nor is it a defense to an action for overtime compensation that the contract of employment provided that the employee was not to work a greater number of hours than prescribed by law.[80] Since under the National Labor Relations Act collective bargaining agreements must be in writing, as discussed supra § 28 (39), an employer cannot assert as a defense an oral agreement made with a union's representative delaying the effective date of a written bargaining agreement.[81]

Good faith of employer. The fact that the employer committed a violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act in good faith based on a mistake of law has been held not a defense to an action for the additional compensation and liquidated damages due under the act;[82] nor is a mutual mistake of fact and law by both parties a sufficient defense.[83] More specifically, the good faith of an employer in believing that a particular employment was not covered by the act,[84] or, if subject to the act, that the employment contract and payments made thereunder constituted full compliance with it,[85] has been held not a defense. However, under an amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act so providing, it is a defense to an action for minimum wages and overtime pay that the act or omission complained of was in good faith in conformity with, and in reliance on, an administrative regulation, order, ruling, approval, or interpretation of the agency administrating the act; but such defense will not prevail if such reliance is not shown.[86]

Payment or offer of payment. Since the right of action under the act is for liquidated damages as well as for the claimed unpaid compensation, it is not a defense that the employer, on learning that the act was applicable, expressed his willingness, or offered, to pay,[87] or voluntarily paid,[88] the additional compensation due; and it is not a valid defense to an action by an employee that the wage and hour division of the department of labor had found that he should be paid additional wages,[89] and that the employer was ready and willing to pay the amount found due, that the employee had refused to accept it, and that the employer had deposited the amount in court.[90] Moreover, the facts that the employer paid plaintiff in accordance with agreements between them, and that plaintiff never raised any question concerning his wages, do not constitute a defense.[91]

Employee's failure to keep accurate record of overtime. Where the employee suing for additional compensation under the act was charged by his employment with the duty of keeping a record of overtime worked, his failure in good faith to keep such record has been held not to estop him to bring such action;[92] but if he was charged with the duty of deciding whether or not he and the other employees were within the scope of the act, and he had decided erroneously that he was not, he would be estopped to recover.[93] However, where an employee deliberately falsified the record of his overtime work he would be estopped to claim compensation for overtime work additional to that shown by the record.[94]

Set-off. Since the freedom of contract contemplated by the act does not include the right to compute the regular rate in a wholly unrealistic and artificial manner so as to negate the purpose of the statute, as discussed supra § 151 (26) c, a contract for the payment of a specified sum for special or supervisory duties cannot be set-off against an employee's claim for overtime compensation under the act.[95]

§ 160(6). —— Parties

a. In general

b. Actions under Fair Labor Standards Act

a. In General

Except as the statute provides otherwise, the general rules and statutes governing questions as to parties in civil actions usually apply in actions to enforce a statute regulating wages.

Except in so far as a statute regulating wages or the payment thereof contains express provisions as to parties to actions to enforce it,[96] the rules and statutes governing questions relating to parties in civil actions generally have been held to apply.[97] It has been held that a cause of action under a prevailing rate of wages act survives the death of the employee and may be filed thereafter by the employee's personal representative.[98]

Agreement with collective bargaining agent

In action to recover unpaid wages by way of overtime compensation under the act, defense that plaintiff was employed under contract between defendant and union which acted as plaintiff's collective bargaining agent, that contract provided for work in excess of eight hours on any work day to be compensated at rate of time and a half of regular rate of pay, and that defendant duly complied with contract, was insufficient as a matter of law.—Berkowitz v. Roshevsky & Co., 38 N.Y.S.2d 61.

Mutual mistake

In action to recover unpaid overtime wages, defense that collective bargaining agreements had been entered into under belief that the act was inapplicable to employee, and that, if parties were in error, mistake was a mutual one, and agreements should be reformed, was insufficient.—Bailey v. Karolyna Co., D.C.N.Y., 50 F.Supp. 142.

Duty as to record

In determining whether office manager was estopped to claim overtime compensation under Fair Labor Standards Act, such manager owed a duty to his employer to see that records were kept of overtime worked by employees covered by the act and to see that such employees were paid for their overtime.—George Lawley & Son Corporation v. South, supra.

Duty not shown

A corporation's office manager who worked eighty-five per cent of his time on books, and who was also its treasurer and a director, was not charged with duty of deciding for corporation whether he or any of the office workers were covered by Fair Labor Standards Act, as regards whether such manager who failed to keep a record of his own overtime was estopped to claim overtime compensation.—George Lawley & Son Corporation v. South, supra.

Employee keeping two records

In an action against a trailer manufacturing company by the ex-foreman of a service department connected with its retail sales branch, to recover overtime pay under the act, the trial court properly found an estoppel against the foreman, who kept one record of his overtime for the company, which paid him accordingly, and secretly kept another record of his own, allegedly because the headquarters office was insisting that overtime should be held to a minimum.—Gale v. Fruehauf Trailer Co., supra.

Suit by one or more

Action by employees against employer to recover double the amount of deductions from wages for alleged faulty workmanship, under statute prohibiting such deductions unless specified procedure is followed, is an action involving a question of a common interest within statute authorizing suit by one or more for the benefit of the whole when question is one of a common or general interest of many persons.—Peters v. International Harvester Co., supra.

b. Actions under Fair Labor Standards Act

The provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act that an action may be brought by one or more employees, or by an agent or representative designated by one or more employees, on behalf of all employees similarly situated has been held merely to permit a joinder of actions, and such an action will not bind employees who do not consent thereto. It may be affected by state statutes relating to who may bring suit.

The question of who may maintain an action under the Fair Labor Standards Act or may be parties to it is purely one of procedure, as distinguished from any question of the substantive rights which the provisions of the act afford.[99] While in designating who may maintain a proceeding to enforce the act the federal statute is supreme,[1] where the action is tried in a state court the rules of practice and procedure of the state court control.[2] The act discloses an intention to limit civil remedies against employers only.[3] In general it is discretionary with the court whether additional parties plaintiff or defendant may be ordered brought in to the case.[4] In order to question the efficacy of a regulation or a power emanating from, or vested in, an executive, such as the administrator of the wage and hour division of the department of labor, it is necessary to have that executive in the suit.[5]

Suits on behalf of others. Under an express provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act to that effect, an action for the recovery of claims arising under the act may be brought by one or more employees,[6] or by an agent or representative designated by one or more employees,[7] for and on behalf of all employees similarly situated. The purpose of this provision is to avoid multiplicity of suits;[8] and the provision should be given a liberal and remedial construction and should be liberally administered by the courts.[9] It has been held that this provision makes an exception to the general doctrine that an action must be maintained in the name of the real party in interest,[10] and it has been variously affected by state statutes relating to who may bring suit.[11] Thus it has been held that an action, under this provision, on behalf of others is maintainable under a state statute requiring suit to be brought by the real party in interest, but providing that it may be brought by a person expressly authorized by statute to sue;[12] but under the provisions of some statutes it has been held that, while joinder of employees in

Discretion held not abused

In action under Fair Labor Standards Act for unpaid minimum wages and overtime, trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing defendant's motion to make certain other companies parties defendant on theory that plaintiff was an independent contractor acting as watchman for various firms.—Ashenford v. Rational interpretation

The provision of Fair Labor Standards Act authorizing joinder in one action of claims by employees similarly situated must be given a rational interpretation, and district courts have a wide discretion in shaping up the limits of the action.—Wright v. U. S. Rubber Co., D.C.Iowa, 69 F.Supp. 621.

Disability not required

The Fair Labor Standards Act does not require that an employee be under a disability before he may empower another to maintain an action in his behalf against employer for unpaid wages and to recover liquidated damages for nonpayment thereof.—McNorrill v. Gibbs, D.C.S.C., 45 F.Supp. 363.

Suits by infant employees

The state statute declaring employer immune from suit by infant's parent or guardian for wages paid infant in absence of written notice to employer of claim for such wages within thirty days after commencement of infant's employment does not preclude infant employee and her attorney from bringing action against employer under federal Fair Labor Standards Act for unpaid minimum wages, overtime compensation, liquidated damages, and attorney's fees on behalf of herself and other employees pursuant to either written or parol authorization by them.—Asaro v. Lilienfeld, supra.

an action is permissible, one or more employees cannot maintain a representative suit on behalf of others.[13] Under the statutes of some jurisdictions it has been held that if several employees join in one action,[14] or if one employee sues for himself and on behalf of other employees similarly situated,[15] it is a misjoinder of actions.

While it has been broadly stated that the section of the Fair Labor Standards Act provides for a class action,[16] it has been more precisely described as a spurious class action.[17] This provision does not broaden or change existing rules governing class actions[18] so as to authorize the prosecution of an action on behalf of persons who have not appeared or authorized the suit and who may be unwilling to appear therein;[19] and an action under this provision is not truly a representative action in the sense that any one plaintiff truly represents a class.[20] Rather this provision sets up a permissive joinder device[21] in that it authorizes and permits,[22] but does not compel,[23] all employees similarly situated to join and have their cases heard in one action. It creates an exception to the general rule that two or more separate or distinct causes of action may not be joined for trial in the same case,[24] that is, it provides for one law suit in which the court, at the instance of one or more employees, may adjudicate the claims of different employees who are similarly situated in their relation to the employer, notwithstanding their respective claims may be different in amount and be otherwise separate and independent of each other.[25] The provision does not authorize the joinder of two or more plaintiffs who are not themselves similarly situated;[26] and the action will not affect those who

13. N.Y.—Simmons v. Rudolph Knitting Mills, 35 N.Y.S.2d 494, 264 App.Div. 871.

Question of common or general interest

While it was not decided whether a representative action could be brought under a statute authorizing suit by the real party in interest or by a person expressly authorized by statute, it was held that all employees of an employer might have united in a single action under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to recover overtime wages and wages due and unpaid for regular hours of employment, but only three of the employees could not maintain a representative action on behalf of other employees under section of the civil practice act authorizing an action for the benefit of others, where question is one of common or general interest or where it is impracticable to bring in very numerous parties.—Simmons v. Rudolph Knitting Mills, supra.

Suit by assignee of claims

An action under the Fair Labor Standards Act, including a first cause of action for recovery of overtime pay claimed to be due plaintiff as an employee and thirty-nine other causes of action by plaintiff as assignee of thirty-nine other persons having like claims, could not be maintained as a class action within statute.—Archer v. Congressional intention

It cannot be implied that congress intended that question of liability for unpaid minimum wages and unpaid overtime compensation or both, or one, or part of one and part of the other, should constitute a nexus on which may be centered the similar rights of employees having one or the other, or both, of such claims to have their rights adjudged by an action maintained by another, of which they might have no knowledge.—Saxton v. W. S. Askew Co., D. C.Ga., 35 F.Supp. 519.

"Similarly situated"

(1) In interpreting words "similarly situated" as used in Fair Labor Standards Act the court should not be governed by how much or what degree of similarity there may be, but should permit such a procedure if there is any similarity.—Distelhorst v. Day & Zimmerman, D.C. Iowa, 58 F.Supp. 334.

(2) Employees of a general class, although not identically situated, may be "similarly situated."—Burns v. Gilpin, 188 S.W.2d 338, 182 Tenn. 535.

(3) Plaintiffs and interveners employed by company as officers on a salary, who claimed that they performed work similar to that engaged in by men under them, were similarly situated within provision of act.—Wright v. U. S. Rubber Co., D.C. Iowa, 69 F.Supp. 621.

(4) Where plaintiff was a building foreman, and each claimant was a foreman or held a position of similar relationship in employer's plant, even though there was a marked difference in employment of each, defense that some or all of claimants were not similarly situated with plaintiff within meaning of the act was overruled.—Distelhorst v. Day & Zimmerman, supra.

are not similarly situated.[27]

Authority to sue and repudiation thereof. In order that an agent or representative may be entitled to bring suit on behalf of employees having a grievance against the employer, the agent or representative must have been designated or authorized for that purpose;[28] but an assignment of the claim of another employee is not required.[29] Where an action is brought by one or more employees on behalf of other employees, the latter may repudiate and disclaim the authority of the former to bring suit in their behalf;[30] but, on the ground that public policy forbids an employee's loss of rights under the act by waiver, agreement, or release, it has been held that such employees are not precluded from nullifying such repudiation and disclaimer and again asserting their rights in such action.[31]

Persons affected by action. A representative action cannot be continued as far as it affects employees without whose knowledge and consent it was brought and against whose wishes it is being maintained.[32] Accordingly the action can proceed and will be binding only as to those employees who indicate, by the record, their approval of the action on their behalf.[33] In order to be entitled to the benefits of the action, unnamed claimants must at some stage of the action be named as parties or as specific beneficiaries of the action, as by an amended or supplemental pleading;[34] and the action cannot continue and will not be binding with respect to unnamed parties unless they intervene or designate someone in writing as their representative for the purpose of the action.[35] However, every opportunity possible should be given to the employees to come into court and make their complaints known.[36] A recovery can be had only by the employee who instituted the action, or by one who established that he is the representative of other employees and is specially authorized to maintain the action in their behalf, or by other employees who individually or collectively may intervene in said action.[37] It has been held that the persons "similarly situated" in whose behalf the suit is brought need not be made parties to the action, since they are not indispensable parties;[38] and the names of persons who would be benefited by the action may be ascertained through the medium of interrogatories or through some other medium.[39] Where the employees interested and involved in an action for additional compensation and liquidated damages under the act were individually named as plaintiffs, the union to which they belonged was held not a proper party plaintiff.[40]

Right to intervene. Persons within the purview of the act have the right to intervene or designate plaintiff as their representative;[41] and it has been held that the right to intervene is an unconditional right,[42] although it has been held that any employee

Authorization by one employee

An agent bringing action to enforce employee's right to receive minimum wage provided in Fair Labor Standards Act need not receive authority from every employee for whose benefit the agent brings the action, it being sufficient if it is shown that he was authorized by one employee either to bring the action for that employee or for that employee and all others who were similarly situated and to be benefited thereby.—Townsend v. Boston & M. R. R., supra.

§ 160(7). —— Pleading

a. In general
b. Actions under Fair Labor Standards Act

a. In General

General rules of pleading have been applied in actions under statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof.

The rules governing pleadings in civil actions generally have been applied in actions to recover wages or penalties under statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof,[44] such as statutes providing for the payment of prevailing wages to public employees or employees on public works[45] and statutes providing penalties for the failure to pay wages at specified times or on discharge of an employee.[46] While it has been held that, in order to recover for overtime under a wages and hours statute which makes a violation of the act a penal offense, the employee's complaint must allege a contract, express or implied, to pay for such overtime,[47] it has also been held that the employee is entitled to recover for overtime if the overtime compensation regardless of ordinary requirements of law as to proper joinder of actions or proper joinder of parties plaintiff, and, if they have an absolute right to join as plaintiffs, they must have an absolute right to intervene in the action or to become plaintiffs after its commencement.—Tennessee Coal, Iron, & R. Co. v. Muscoda Local 123, etc., supra.

Standard of day's work

A declaration, in an action to recover for overtime worked, under a statute setting up eight hours as the standard of a day's work, but which has been construed as permitting the parties to agree as to hours and wages, was held to show that employee and railroad agreed on hours of service and compensation therefor, precluding employee from recovering for services rendered in excess of eight hours a day.—Plummer v. Pennsylvania R. Co., C.C.A. Ill., 37 F.2d 874.

Statute as to minimum wage and overtime

Petition in action by female telephone operator to recover extra compensation for overtime without contract or agreement respecting pay therefor, was insufficient because of failure to allege that minimum wage rates to which she was entitled had been fixed by order of industrial commission under statutes relating to minimum wages and maximum hours of service for women and minors.—Consolidated Tel. Co. v. Stevens, 168 S.W.2d 1012, 293 Ky. 313.

Unauthorized deductions

Complaint, alleging that employer carried on practice of making deductions from wages of plaintiff employees for alleged defective workmanship without following statutory procedure for determination that alleged defective work was due to plaintiffs' negligence or willful conduct, alleging that employer's record would disclose exact amount of deductions, and praying judgment for twice amount so withheld, stated a cause of action under statute.—Peters v. International Harvester Co., 22 N.W.2d 518, 248 Wis. 451.

Requisites and sufficiency of complaint

(1) In action by civil service employee to recover difference between wages actually paid and prevailing rate required to be paid by statute, employee must allege compliance with statutory provision having to do with making and filing by the comptroller of an order fixing the prevailing rate of wages.—Olsen v. Brooklyn Ash Removal Co., 198 N.E. 561, 268 N.Y. 693—Ziegler v. City of New York, 300 N.Y.S. 1152, 253 App. Div. 764, appeal denied 13 N.E.2d 786, 277 N.Y. 740—Cirillo v. City of New York, 10 N.Y.S.2d 472, 170 Misc. 230, affirmed 19 N.Y.S.2d 151, 259 App. Div. 717, reargument denied 20 N. Y.S.2d 402, 259 App.Div. 875, affirmed 39 N.E.2d 273, 287 N.Y. 641.

(2) However, where one employed by a contractor on public works sued on the public work contract, which contained a stipulation to pay a certain minimum wage, the complaint was held to state good cause of action, although not alleging that plaintiff or some one working on project complained to industrial commissioner, that latter fixed prevailing rate of wages, and that action was begun within three months thereafter.—Corti v. Wexler, 287 N Y.S. 243, 159 Misc. 116.

(3) In action in county court to recover wages, allegedly due by virtue of the labor law, where it did not appear whether defendant corporation was a domestic or foreign corporation, defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint on ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action was denied with leave to make further appropriate motions.—Didio v. S. A. Healey Co., 40 N.Y.S.2d 278.

Issues, proof, and variance

(1) In action to recover the difference between the wages actually paid and the prevailing rate the employee must prove the making and filing by the proper officer of an order fixing the prevailing rate of wages.—Ziegler v. City of New York, 300 N.Y.S. 1152, 253 App.Div. 764, appeal denied—Cirillo v. City of New York, 10 N.Y.S.2d 472, 170 Misc. 230, affirmed 19 N.Y.S.2d 151, 259 App.Div. 717, reargument denied 20 N.Y.S.2d 402, 259 App.Div. 875, affirmed 39 N.E.2d 273, 287 N.Y. 641.

(2) So a laborer could not recover from contractor the difference between what he had received for work on county jail and what he alleged to be the general prevailing rate of per diem wages in suit in justice or county court in absence of showing that such rate had been fixed by commissioners' court, since commissioners' court is the public body directed by statute to determine and specify such rate.—Southern Prison Co. v. Rennels, Tex.Civ.App., 110 S.W.2d 606, error dismissed.

complaint alleges an employment contract at a specified rate of pay.[48]

b. Actions under Fair Labor Standards Act

As in civil actions generally, the complaint in an action for additional compensation and liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act must state facts sufficient to constitute a good cause of action.

In accordance with the rules governing pleadings in civil actions generally, the complaint in an action for additional compensation and liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act must state a good cause of action.[49] The complaint must contain a plain and concise statement of the material facts,[50] must allege a valid claim under the act,[51] and must be sufficient to permit defendant to prepare a responsive pleading;[52] but the complaint need not state evidentiary facts which are more probably available to defendant and not within plaintiff's knowledge.[53] The complaint should state plainly and explicitly the facts establishing the jurisdiction of the court over the action.[54]

The complaint must specifically aver the contractual relationship of employer and employee,[55] must clearly identify the employer and the employee,[56] must state the period of employment of each plaintiff or groups of plaintiffs[57] or the reason for the inability so to state,[58] and must set out the employer's failure to perform his duty in carrying out the obligations imposed on the employer by the act.[59] In an action against joint defendants the complaint should show that plaintiff was employed by both defendants[60] and should allege a wrong at-

Allegations held sufficient

Allegations of hours per day plaintiff worked and sums per week or per fortnight he was paid therefor were allegations of a contract at a specified rate of pay and were sufficient to authorize recovery at that same rate of pay for time worked beyond contract or customary time, under Puerto Rican law regulating working hours.—Domenech v. Complaint held sufficient

A complaint, alleging that complainant was employed by defendant as truck driver in interstate commerce, that he never received wages in conformity with minimum wage and hour requirements of Fair Labor Standards Act, and that he was entitled to additional amount shown by defendant's records, stated claim on which relief might have been granted, if proved, so that court erred in dismissing complaint.—Plunkett v. Abraham Bros. Packing Co., C.C.A.Tenn., 129 F.2d 419.

Complaint held insufficient

A complaint, seeking recovery of extra pay under a labor agreement because employee had been required to work over five hours on stated dates without an opportunity for supper, did not state a claim for unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation within Fair Labor Standards Act.—Livingston v. 60. U.S.—Keegan v. Jacob Ruppert, D.C.N.Y., 2 F.R.D. 8.

Complaint held insufficient

In wood cutter's action against third person and paper company, allegations that defendants employed wood cutter did not overrule positive prior allegations that third person employed wood cutter to cut pulp wood which was delivered to paper company.—Maddox v. Jones, D.C.Ala., 42 F.Supp. 35.

tributed to both defendants.[61] The complaint must also show compliance with any conditions precedent to suit that may be imposed by the employment contract.[62]

In determining whether the complaint is sufficiently specific the procedural rules of the state or court involved are controlling.[63] However, in view of the beneficent objectives and the informal procedural provisions of the act,[64] much latitude must be allowed in passing on the sufficiency of a complaint under the act;[65] and pleadings should be so construed as to do substantial justice and further the humanitarian purposes of the act.[66] Thus, where a complaint states a claim on which relief may be granted and another claim which is invalid, the court should treat the latter part of the complaint as immaterial.[67]

Pleading overtime claim. In an action under the act to recover overtime compensation the complaint must allege the performance of overtime work,[68] and must state all material circumstances relating to the overtime worked,[69] such as when and to what extent overtime was worked.[70] However, it is not fatal for the complaint to fail to state the exact hours worked, the exact amounts due, and other detailed facts which are probably not within plaintiff's knowledge.[71] Where a bona fide contract between an employer and employee is made which meets the requirements of the act as to the minimum wage to be paid, it has been held necessary, in a suit to recover overtime compensation under the act, to allege specifically the rate used in computing the unpaid deficiency of overtime compensation.[72]

Under the provisions of the Portal-to-Portal Act, which modified the Fair Labor Standards Act, a complaint seeking overtime pay for time spent in preparing for work and in checking out after work must allege that there was a contract, custom, or practice providing for such compensation.[73] In actions prior to the Portal-to-Portal Act for time spent on the employer's premises before and after the scheduled working hours, it was held that the complaint should definitely state how much extra time was involved[74] and the nature of the employee's ac-

Liberal construction

The trend of judicial thought seems to be toward a liberal construction of the pleadings with a view to permitting the parties going into every possible phase of a cause of action such as here presented by the complaint.—Schempf v. Armour & Co., D.C.Minn., 5 F.R.D. 294.

68. N.Y.—Volzing v. General Public Loan Corporation, 32 N.Y.S.2d 31.

General Public Loan Corporation, supra.

69. U.S.—Sirmon v. Cron & Gracey Drilling Corporation, D.C.La., 44 F.Supp. 29.

Particular circumstances

In employee's action for wages for overtime spent in traveling on employer's boat to and from the place of work, the petition should have alleged specifically when employee commenced work and when work ended, where employee resided, the number of hours worked during each week, and whether place from which boat sailed was a place at which employees were assembled to be transported to their work.—Sirmon v. The reason for the rule is the probability that plaintiff was without definite and exact knowledge of hours and wages in controversy, whereas defendants undoubtedly had full and complete records bearing on the matter.—Townsend v. Boston & M. R. R., supra.

Particular facts within rule

tivities during such time;[75] but the complaint was not required to allege evidentiary or immaterial facts relating to such overtime.[76]

Purview of act; activity in interstate commerce. In an action under the act the allegations of the complaint must substantially bring plaintiff within the purview of the act.[77] The complaint should allege not only that the employer was engaged in interstate commerce[78] but should also allege facts showing that the employee, in the performance of his duties, was engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for such commerce;[79]

Other and different activities

Character of clothing required

That portion of complaint seeking overtime compensation which alleged that employees because of nature of their work were required to change into work clothes or protective clothing, to obtain equipment, and to make other necessary preparations for work, all of which were required to be done prior to scheduled starting time, would not be made more definite by requiring plaintiffs to allege character of clothing mentioned. —Grospian v. (3) A complaint, which alleged that a part of complainant's duties consisted in unloading from freight cars merchandise shipped in interstate commerce and in moving, from employers' warehouse onto loading platform, merchandise to be picked up by common carriers and transported to other states, was not subject to demurrer because it was therein alleged that employee's duties consisted principally in the driving of a truck in intra-state commerce, but facts should be developed in order to give employee the opportunity to show just what duties he performed with respect to which he would be entitled to benefits of Fair Labor Standards Act.—Gibson v. Glasgow, 157 S.W.2d 814, 178 Tenn. 273.

(4) A complaint, alleging that defendant was engaged in the production of goods for interstate commerce and that between specified dates plaintiffs had worked overtime without receiving compensation therefor, was sufficient, and motion for a more definite statement by enumerating products on which plaintiffs were employed, and stating nature of work performed on products manufactured for interstate commerce, would be denied.—Baret v. Wash.—Ikola v. Snoqualmie Falls Lumber Co., 121 P.2d 369, 12 Wash. 2d 341.

(2) Complaint which merely alleged that defendant was a foreign corporation engaged in interstate commerce failed to state cause of action, since act implies that corporation engaged in interstate commerce may as part of its business be engaged in purely intra-state commerce with respect to portion of its business.—Foster v. National Biscuit Co., D.C.Wash., 31 F.Supp. 552.

(3) Petition alleging that defendant employer was engaged in construction of state and national highways, and that plaintiff employee was employed by defendant as a night watchman at defendant's place of business to watch the plant, including equipment and other property, and to clean out the office, was sufficient.—Preston v. Louis Des Cognets & Co., 167 S.W.2d 863, 292 Ky. 646.

(4) Allegation that employer was engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods therefor was not sufficient to show that employee was entitled to benefits of the act, particularly where the complaint further alleged that a substantial portion of employer's merchandise was shipped in interstate commerce thereby implying that some merchandise was not shipped out of the state.—Helt v. Britten-Fenton Co., 42 N.Y.S.2d 362, 180 Misc. 1076.

(5) Complaint disclosing that plaintiff's duties were to watch rail-and where the employee was engaged in both interstate and intra-state commerce the complaint must point out what part of his work was in each.[80] However, it has also been held, under the rule that a complaint should not be dismissed for informality or insufficiency of statement unless it appears certain that no basic right of action can possibly exist under any state of facts which may be proved in support of plaintiff's asserted claim, that the sufficiency of plaintiff's services must depend on the proof and disclosures at the trial, so that a complaint otherwise satisfactory will not be held insufficient as failing to state a cause of action sufficient to invoke the jurisdiction of the court.[81] The complaint should contain a concise statement of the particular kind of employment, including the place where it was performed,[82] even though the employee is unable to allege in minute detail its ultimate relation to interstate commerce.[83]

Suits in behalf of others. A complaint under the act may properly state that it is brought in behalf of plaintiff and all other employees similarly situated,[84] and the complaint must set forth the authority of plaintiff as representative or agent of employees to bring the suit;[85] but it has also been held that a failure to allege that plaintiffs were the authorized agents or representatives of the unnamed parties to the cause does not render the complaint subject to dismissal.[86] However, it has also been held that a complaint will be insufficient as to unnamed claimants where it does not appear that they are participating in the suit and are willing to be bound by the final judgment.[87]

Allegations predicating the right of recovery for employees not specifically enumerated as plaintiffs may properly be included in the complaint so that other employees similarly situated may become parties;[88] and where unnamed claimants are made parties or specific beneficiaries of a representative action under the act, as by an amended or supplemental pleading, facts must be alleged in the pleadings relative to each of such claimants establishing that they were engaged in the production of goods for interstate commerce within the meaning of the act.[89] It has been held that the complaint must state and number separately the causes of action of each of the employees on whose behalf the suit is brought;[90] but it is not necessary to state separately a cause of action as to each plaintiff, provided those who are joined in any one action are in fact employees similarly situated.[91] Where the action is brought in behalf of other employees similarly situated, intervening complainants are authorized to file an intervening complaint or such other authority as might place them within the jurisdiction of the court.[92]

Negativing defenses; exemptions. In an action under the Fair Labor Standards Act the complaint need not negative defenses that may possibly be asserted.[93] Thus the complaint is not required to negative the exemptions of the act in order to state a cause of action.[94] However, if a complaint shows on its face that plaintiff is excepted from the operation of the act as being within one of the exemptions,[95] as where he is under the jurisdiction of, road cars filled with coal brought from Pennsylvania to New York did not establish that plaintiff was engaged in interstate commerce where complaint disclosed that, before coming under his surveillance, coal cars reached their destination upon consignee coal sales company's siding or in its yards, and where, although consignee was a wholesaler, complaint said nothing about any one being interested in receiving the coal except consignee and made no claim that consignee was the alter ego of the delivering railroad.—Delcour v. Rules governing sufficiency of pleadings

In action by numerous employees for overtime compensation, liquidated damages, etc., under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the sufficiency of the complaint on defendant's motion for a more definite statement is to be determined by the same principles that would be applicable if there were only one plaintiff.—Baret v. Complaints held sufficient

(1) In action brought against employer allegedly engaged in business and subject to regulation by, the Interstate Commerce Commission,[96] it is insufficient.

Answer. In an action under the Fair Labor Standards Act the answer must state facts sufficient to constitute a defense,[97] and the defense so stated must be a valid defense.[98] In order that a release may be asserted as a valid defense, the answer must allege that there has been payment of all sums due under the act.[99] Matters of affirmative defense must be specially raised in defendant's pleadings.[1]

Amendment. The general rules governing the allowance of amendments in civil actions have been applied in actions to enforce the Fair Labor Standards Act.[2]

Issues, proof, and variance. As in civil actions generally, the issues in actions to recover additional compensation and liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act are determined by the pleadings,[3] the proof must correspond with the allega-or crushing cotton seed, flax seed, and other oil producing vegetable commodities for purpose of extracting oil and for purpose of producing cake meal and other by-products, provisions of act relating to seasonal exemptions were inapplicable where pleadings did not indicate that employer was engaged in the first processing; and the complaint stated a cause of action except for the operation relating to cotton seed which was exempt.—Abram v. San Joaquin Cotton Oil Co., D.C.Cal., 46 F.Supp. 969.

(2) Complaint alleging that plaintiff was employed as a night watchman by a private police corporation and that corporation did not fall within provision of act exempting employees engaged in any service establishment, according to labor department's interpretative bulletin was not subject to an exception of no cause of action.—Brister v. Boylan's Private Police, La.App., 8 So.2d 386.

(1) Complaint alleging that employers were engaged in transporting money from and to banks, etc., engaged in interstate commerce and in production of goods for interstate commerce, and that employees were employed as chauffeurs, custodians, and armed guards in operation of motor vehicles used in such transportation, did not warrant conclusion that the transportation was in interstate commerce within Motor Carrier Act so as to render overtime provisions of Fair Labor Standards Act inapplicable.—Earle v. Brink's Inc., D.C.N.Y., 54 F.Supp. 676.

(2) Complaint which alleged interstate character of employer's business, employment of plaintiff, and that principal service rendered by plaintiff was operation of truck between Arkansas and Oklahoma was not dismissible as showing that plaintiff was continuously engaged in driving an interstate truck for employer and hence excepted from benefits of act as an employee with respect to whom Interstate Commerce Commission has power to establish qualifications and maximum hours of service.—Musteen v. Herbert McLean Purdy Management Corporation, 47 N.Y.S. 2d 260, 181 Misc. 724.

Answer held insufficient

Answer asserting a release by employees of employer's liability for wages due under Fair Labor Standards Act without alleging facts showing the existence of a bona fide dispute was insufficient to state a defense to action to recover unpaid minimum wages and liquidated damages due under the act.—Cassese v. Manufacturers Trust Co., 46 N.Y.S.2d 621, 182 Misc. 344.

a. Presumptions and Burden of Proof

(a) In general
(b) Actions under Fair Labor Standards Act

(a) In General

The rules governing presumptions and the burden of proof in civil actions generally have been applied in actions under statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof.

In accordance with the rules governing presumptions in civil actions generally, considered in Evidence §§ 114–157, the courts have adjudicated the propriety and effect of particular presumptions in actions to enforce the various statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof.[7] The burden of proving facts necessary and sufficient to constitute a good cause of action under such statutes is generally on plaintiff,[8] while the burden of proving defenses and matters of avoidance is on defendant.[9]

similarly situated to recover overtime compensation under Fair Labor Standards Act, only those claims may be considered which are made by those who appear as plaintiffs or interveners in the record.—Pentland v. Dravo Corp., D.C.Pa., 4 F.R.D. 350, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., 152 F.2d 851.

4. U.S.—Bowman v. Pace Co., C.C.A. Fla., 119 F.2d 858.

5. U.S.—Timberlake v. Day & Zimmerman, D.C.Iowa, 49 F.Supp. 28.
Mo.—Vannoy v. Swift & Co., 201 S.W.2d 350.

Particular matters required to be proved

(1) That plaintiff engaged in commerce or engaged in production of goods for commerce.
U.S.—Lockwood v. Hercules Powder Co., D.C.Mo., 7 F.R.D. 24.
Mo.—Ashenford v. L. Yukon & Sons Produce Co., 172 S.W.2d 881, 237 Mo.App. 1241.

(2) Type of employment, number of hours worked by each employee, and how much he is entitled to recover.—Smith v. Stark Trucking, D.C.Ohio, 53 F.Supp. 826.

6. N.Y.—Rubin v. Meadow Provision Co., 39 N.Y.S.2d 518.

7. N.Y.—Ziegler v. City of New York, 281 N.Y.S. 462, 156 Misc. 624, affirmed 291 N.Y.S. 401, 248 App. Div. 873 and 300 N.Y.S. 1152, 253 App.Div. 764.

Payment of prevailing rates

On demurrer to bill for difference between wages paid and prescribed minimum wages, where bill did not allege that the required wage scales had not been posted, presumption was that such scales had been posted.—Harris v. Owen, 176 S.W.2d 812, 180 Tenn. 492, modified on other grounds 180 S.W.2d 227, 180 Tenn. 492.

Maximum hours

In employee's action to recover for hours worked in excess of that permitted by statute, determination whether there has been such constraint by employer as to permit recovery by employee does not rest on any presumption declared by law to result from the fact of employment, but must be established by evidence.—Lewis v. Ferrari, 90 P.2d 384, 34 Cal.App.2d Supp. 767.

Redemption of scrip or tokens

In action against employer by transferee of scrip issued to laborers to recover value of scrip, it was presumed that the scrip was issued for wages earned for services rendered.—Barker v. Stearns Coal & Lumber Co., 152 S.W.2d 953, 287 Ky. 340.

Cal.—Sayre v. Western Bowl, 174 P. 2d 466, 76 Cal.App.2d 793.
Ky.—Barker v. Stearns Coal & Lumber Co., 163 S.W.2d 466, 291 Ky. 184—West Kentucky Coal Co. v. Nall, 27 S.W.2d 965, 234 Ky. 249.
La.—Altom v. Mt. Vernon Oil & Gas Co., 141 So. 457, 174 La. 775.

Minimum wage law

In public housekeeper's action against hospital employer to recover a balance allegedly due under the state minimum wage law, in order to claim the benefits of order fixing a minimum wage for employees of public housekeeping establishments plaintiff was required to bring herself within the class covered by the order.—Pagel v. Trinity Hospital Ass'n, 6 N.W.2d 392, 72 N.D. 262.

Payment of prevailing rates

In an action by a public employee or an employee on public work to recover the difference between what he was actually paid and the alleged prevailing rate, the employee has the burden of proving a prevailing wage rate in excess of the rate at which he was paid.—McCaffrey v. State, 181 N.E. 84, 259 N.Y. 159—Queeny v. State, 279 N.Y.S. 281, 244 App.Div. 761, followed in Adwin v. State, 279 N.Y.S. 282, 244 App.Div. 761—Ziegler v. City of New York, 281 N.Y.S. 462, 156 Misc. 624, affirmed 291 N.Y.S. 401, 248 App.Div. 873 and 300 N.Y.S. 1152, 253 App.Div. 764.

Discrimination against women

In action to recover under statute penalizing discrimination in wage rates between men and women under specified conditions, where plaintiff brought action on her own behalf and as assignee of claim of twenty-eight other women employees, plaintiff had burden of showing to a computable certainty damage sustained by her and each of her assignors.—St. John v. General Motors Corporation, 13 N.W.2d 840, 308 Mich. 333.

9. Ky.—West Kentucky Coal Co. v. Nall, 27 S.W.2d 965, 234 Ky. 249.

Wages of women and minors

(1) In suit against hotel operators for overtime wages due under minimum wage order of industrial commission pursuant to statute as to wages of women and minors, hotel operators claiming that order was void because commission had failed to make an investigation of particular occupations, but instead had made a blanket investigation of all occupations, had burden of showing how order was illegal as to them as hotel operators.—Martin v. Wolfson, 16 N.W.2d 884, 218 Minn. 557.

(2) In action under minimum wage law by woman telephone operator in town of about one thousand three hundred population against telephone company to recover the difference between wages paid and standard minimum wages, burden was on compa-

(b) Actions under Fair Labor Standards Act

Generally the plaintiff has the burden of proving a cause of action under the Fair Labor Standards Act, while the defendant has the burden of proving matters of defense.

In accordance with the rules governing presumptions in civil actions generally, the courts have adjudicated the propriety and effect of particular presumptions in actions for additional compensation and liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act.[10] In such actions the burden of proof is on plaintiff[11] to prove his claim for unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation,[12] and he has the burden of proving every statutory allegation in issue.[13] Thus plaintiff has the burden of proving that he was employed by defendant,[14] and that the employer has violated the act[15] in that plaintiff performed work for which he was not properly compensated.[16] Plaintiff also has the burden of establishing the number of hours worked[17] and the amount of wages allegedly due.[18]

In an action to recover overtime compensation under the act the employee has the burden of proving not only the fact of overtime work[19] and his employer's knowledge thereof,[20] but also the amount ny to prove its claim that the workmen's compensation bureau had authorized departure from otherwise applicable standards by classifying company as a rural exchange.—Wiseth v. Traill County Telephone Co., 5 N.W.2d 307, 72 N.D. 165—Wiseth v. Traill County Telephone Co., 291 N.W. 689, 70 N.D. 44.

10. U.S.—White v. Witwer Grocer Co., C.C.A.Iowa, 132 F.2d 108.

Absenteeism

From fact of absenteeism on part of some employees it could not be assumed that all employees were absent during any work week.—Walling v. Anaconda Copper Min. Co., D.C. Mont., 66 F.Supp. 913.

Presumption as to overtime worked

Where employee received six dollars per week for cleaning girls' restrooms and received seven and one-half cents per case for packing popcorn, employee averaged fourteen cases per hour, for five weeks employee's earnings from packaging popcorn were thirty-seven dollars and sixty-five cents or more per week, and no records were maintained by employer showing her hours of work, court would not indulge presumption that employee's hours of work did not exceed forty hours per week and employers were violating the overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act by compensating employee on only a straight time, piece rate basis.—Walling v. Lippold, D.C.Neb., 72 F. Supp. 339.

14. U.S.—Engebretsen v. E. J. Albrecht Co., C.C.A.Ill., 150 F.2d 602.

Employment by agent

Where realty agent managing building and building owner allegedly employed plaintiffs as elevator operators, plaintiffs had duty to prove that agent was their employer within the act.—Brennan v. Community Service Soc. of New York, 45 N.Y.S.2d 825, 181 Misc. 637.

15. Tenn.—Hunt v. National Linen Service Corporation, 157 S.W.2d 608, 178 Tenn. 262.

Nonperformance of valid contract

Where valid employment contract is made for payment of an amount in excess of statutory minimum wages, in order to recover minimum wages under Fair Labor Standards Act employee must show that contract has not been performed.—Mornford v. Andrews, C.C.A.Ga., 151 F.2d 511.

Amount of tips received

(1) Where employment agreement was that employer would, on demand, pay all sums necessary with tips to make up twenty-five dollars per week, the burden was on employee suing for minimum wages to prove the amount of tips he received and that they, with the amount paid him, were less than the minimum wage he was entitled to receive.—Mornford v. Andrews, supra.

(2) In suit to recover minimum wages by redcaps who worked under agreement requiring tips to be accounted for to extent necessary to make up minimum wage, burden was not on defendant employer to prove that tips reported by redcap were actually received, but burden was on each redcap to prove amount reported in excess of that received before redcap would be entitled to judgment.—Townsend v. New York Cent. R. Co., C.C.A.Ill., 141 F.2d 483, certiorari denied 65 S.Ct. 47, 323 U.S. 717, 89 L.Ed. 577.

thereof[21] and the amount of wages due each pay period.[22] The burden of the employee to prove that he has performed work for which he was not properly compensated should not be made an impossible hurdle for the employee;[23] and due regard must be given to the fact that the employer has the duty under the act to keep proper records of employment.[24] Accordingly, where the employer's records are inadequate, and the employee produces sufficient evidence to show the amount of work for which he was not properly compensated as a matter of just and reasonable inference, the burden shifts to the employer to come forward with evidence of the precise amount of work performed or with evidence to negative the reasonableness of the inference to be drawn from the employee's evidence[25] even though the employer's lack of adequate records grows out of a bona fide mistake as to whether certain activities or nonactivities constitute work.[26]

Purview of act; interstate commerce. The courts have determined whether particular presumptions as to whether an employee is within the coverage of the act are warranted by the facts of the case.[27] In general plaintiff has the burden of proving that he is within the purview of the act.[28] Thus plaintiff has the burden of showing that his employer was engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for commerce and that plaintiff's occupation was necessary to such commerce or production,[29] or, without regard to the nature of

Time spent in various activities
Even if employees, who orally agreed to remain on employer's premises several nights each week to be available in case of fire alarm, were entitled to overtime compensation under Fair Labor Standards Act for time actually spent waiting for an alarm as distinguished from time spent in recreation and in sleep, employees had burden of proving actual hours spent in each activity.—Skidmore v. Presumptions or inferences held not warranted
The fact that some tenants of loft and office building are engaged in commerce as distinguished from engaged in production of goods for commerce does not warrant inference that elevator operator and handyman employed by building are engaged in commerce so as to be within coverage of act.—Berry v. 34 Irving Place Corporation, supra.

Assumption in passing on sufficiency of defense
In employee's action to enforce employer's double liability for unpaid overtime compensation, supreme court would assume, in passing on legal sufficiency of employer's defense that contract of employment required employee to devote such time as was necessary to his duties as stationary engineer at fixed weekly wage, that employee was one of the class and engaged in an occupation covered by the act.—Emerson v. Maintenance employees in building seeking to recover overtime compen-

the employer's business, that he was engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for interstate commerce,[30] during the period in issue.[31]

If an employee works in both intra-state and interstate commerce he has the burden of proving what part of his work was in intra-state, and what part in interstate, commerce, and the extent of interstate work and when performed,[32] and the failure to sustain such burden bars recovery by the employee,[33] although it has been held that, where the evidence shows that a substantial part of his work was in interstate commerce, he will not be required to prove how much time he was so employed.[34] However, it has been held that after plaintiff has made a prima facie case by showing the general nature of defendant's business and that plaintiff worked on interstate and intra-state business, defendant has the burden of producing evidence to show that not all employees were engaged in interstate commerce or that their interstate work was only for a certain time.[35] Where the employer's sation and liquidated damages under Fair Labor Standards Act had burden of proving that a substantial number of tenants were engaged in production of goods for commerce, the word "substantial" meaning that at least twenty per cent of building be occupied by tenants engaged in production of goods for commerce.—Ullo v. Smith, D.C.N.Y., 62 F.Supp. 757.

Evidence in record

The burden of proof that rests on employees to establish that they are engaged in production of goods for commerce must be met by evidence in the record.—D. A. Schulte, Inc., v. Gangi, N.Y., 66 S.Ct. 925, 328 U.S. 108, 90 L.Ed. 1114.

Substantial part of goods produced

Plaintiff had burden of offering proof that at least a substantial part of the goods which he produced were produced for interstate commerce.—Couch v. Ward, 168 S.W.2d 822, 205 Ark. 308.

Substantial portion of time

(1) An employee must show that a substantial portion of his time was devoted to the production of goods in commerce, as defined in the act.—Gibson v. Glasgow, 157 S.W.2d 814, 178 Tenn. 273.

(2) In action by engineer's assistant and handyman at an electric power plant for overtime allegedly due, where furnishing by plant of current for use outside the state was only sporadic, burden was on assistant to show that he put in overtime in such activity.—Camfield v. 35. U.S.—Guess v. Montague, C.C.A. S.C., 140 F.2d 500.

Matters peculiarly within defendant's knowledge

U.S.—Guess v. Montague, supra.

Commingled activities or businesses

(1) Where employer is engaged in both interstate and intra-state business, the business being commingled with its operation with no attempt being made to distinguish between the two in payment of wages, and a substantial portion of employee's time is spent in that part of busi-

business is essentially a local one, it has been held that the employee has the burden of proving that a substantial part of his activities relate to goods moving in interstate commerce;[36] but, where the employer engages in interstate and intra-state commerce, an employee who produces goods for interstate commerce has been held not required to prove that a substantial portion of his time is so devoted.[37]

Matters of defense; exemptions. In actions under the Fair Labor Standards Act, defendant generally has the burden of proving matters of defense.[38] Accordingly, it has been held that an employer who claims that the act is inapplicable because of the exemption provisions of the act has the burden of proving such claimed exemption,[39] whether the exemption is claimed because of the business of the employer[40] or because of the nature of the particular employment of the employee;[41] and defendant ness relating to interstate commerce, employee is entitled to recover without showing amount of time he spent in interstate as distinguished from intra-state business of employer.—Franz v. Delico Meat Products Co., Mo.App., 198 S.W.2d 874.

(2) An elevator operator or a handyman in a multi-tenant loft and office building, in action for overtime compensation does not have burden of showing what part of his work is in production of goods for interstate commerce where the employer has commingled the employee's activities.—Berry v. 34 Irving Place Corporation, D.C.N.Y., 52 F. Supp. 875.

(3) A watchman at place of business of company engaged in handling fruits, vegetables, and agricultural produce for sale in both intra-state and interstate commerce was not required to separate the time he watched over goods for interstate and intra-state shipments when they were all stored in one building.—Ashenford v. L. Yukon & Sons Produce Co., 172 S.W.2d 881, 237 Mo.App. 1241.

36. U.S.—Ouendag v. Gibson, D.C. Mich., 49 F.Supp. 379.

37. U.S.—Ling v. Currier Lumber Co., D.C.Mich., 50 F.Supp. 204.

38. U.S.—Garchell v. Kantar, D.C. Minn., 56 F.Supp. 866, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., 150 F.2d 47.

Good faith in alteration of records

Where employer's records for several years showed that employee's basic wage was forty dollars per week, and employer thereafter changed books so as to show regular time pay of twenty-eight dollars and overtime pay of twelve dollars per week, it was incumbent on employer to prove that reason for alterations in his system of bookkeeping was not to avoid payment of overtime under Fair Labor Standards Act.—Garchell v. Kantar, supra.

Where defendant's answer interposed only denials, and no defenses, defendant did not have the burden of proof as to whether plaintiff was an employee within the scope of the act, especially where the complaint alleged that plaintiff was not employed in any of the capacities or occupations granted exemptions under the statute.—Anderson v. Material Co-Ordinating Agency, 63 N.Y. S.2d 324.

Within letter and spirit of exemptions

Persons claiming to be excepted from the remedial provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act must bring themselves within letter and spirit of exemptions, which are strictly construed, particularly when exemption claimed is for an employee engaged in interstate commerce.—Fletcher v. Grinnell Bros., C.C.A. Mich., 150 F.2d 337, conformed to, D. C., 64 F.Supp. 778.

40. U.S.—Rouch v. Continental Oil Co., D.C.Kan., 55 F.Supp. 315.

Particular exemptions

(1) An employer, claiming that employees were exempt because "engaged in a retail or service establishment the greater part of whose selling or services is in intrastate commerce" had burden of proving the exemption claimed.

U.S.—Armstrong Co. v. Walling, C.C. A.Mass., 161 F.2d 515—Walling v. Armstrong Co., D.C.Mass., 68 F. Supp. 870—Walling v. Northwestern-Hanna Fuel Co., D.C.Minn., 67 F.Supp. 833—Rouch v. Continental Oil Co., D.C.Kan., 55 F.Supp. 315.

La.—Dennis v. Equitable Equipment Co., App., 7 So.2d 397.

(2) In action by telephone switchboard operator, employer had burden of showing that telephone exchange was public exchange with less than five hundred stations which would bar employee from benefits of the act.—Cherry Lake, Inc., v. Kearce, 26 So.2d 434, 157 Fla. 484.

41. U.S.—Lassiter v. Guy F. Atkinson Co., C.C.A.Wash., 162 F.2d 774—Walling v. Morris, C.C.A.Mich., 155 F.2d 832—Walling v. General Industries Co., C.C.A.Ohio, 155 F. 2d 711—Walling v. McKay, D.C. Kan.—Bush v. Wilson & Co., 138 P.2d 457, 157 Kan. 80.

Particular exemptions

(1) Employer raising defense that certain employees were exempt, as being employed in an executive capacity, had the burden of proving existence of all the conjunctive conditions set out in the regulations defining such employees.—Walling v. General Industries Co., Ohio, 67 S.Ct. 883, 330 U.S. 545, 91 L.Ed. 1088—Helliwell v. Haberman, C.C.A.N.Y., 140 F.2d 833—Pfoser v. Federal Cartridge Corp., D.C.Minn., 70 F.Supp. 701—Lorber v. Rosow, D.C.Conn., 58 F.Supp. 341—Cohn v. Decca Distributing Corporation, D.C.Pa., 50 F. Supp. 270.

Minn.—Pakarinen v. Butler Bros., 16 N.W.2d 769, 218 Minn. 496.

Wis.—Katchel v. Northern Engraving & Mfg. Co., 25 N.W.2d 431, 249 Wis. 578.

(2) The provisions of regulations of wage and hour administrator defining employment in professional capacity within exemption from Fair Labor Standards Act are cumulative and employer has burden of showing exemption.—Stanger v. Vocafilm Corp., C.C.A.N.Y., 151 F.2d 894, 162 A.L.R. 216.

(3) The employer has the burden of showing that its employees are exempt from the act in that they has the burden of showing which of its employees are within a claimed exemption[42] and for what period of time they were so engaged as to be exempt from the act.[43] However, it has also been held, at least under certain conditions, that plaintiff may have the burden of proving facts to establish that he came within the act and was not within an exemption.[44] The applicability of statutory exemptions from the act is never presumed,[45] and in a proper case it may be assumed that the employer is not entitled to claim the exemption.[46]

b. Admissibility

The general rules as to admissibility of evidence in civil actions apply in actions under statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof.

The rules governing the relevancy, competency, and materiality of evidence in civil actions generally are applicable in actions by employees to enforce statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof,[47] such as actions for unpaid minimum wages or overtime compensation and liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act.[48] Thus evidence has been held admissible to show the duties actually performed[49] and the circumstances surrounding the execution of an accord and satisfaction.[50] However, evidence as to the making of claims by other employees,[51] the employer's good faith,[52] contracts be-

are subject to the jurisdiction of, and regulation by, the Interstate Commerce Commission.—Mid-Continent Petroleum Corp. v. Keen, C.C.A. Iowa, 157 F.2d 310—Ispass v. Pyramid Motor Freight Corp., C.C.A.N.Y., 152 F.2d 619, vacated in part on other grounds and remanded 67 S.Ct. 954, 330 U.S. 695, 91 L.Ed. 1184—Crean v. M. Moran Transp. Lines, D.C.N.Y., 57 F.Supp. 212—Brown v. Minngas Co., D.C.Minn., 51 F.Supp. 363—Hutchinson v. William C. Barry, Inc., D.C.Mass., 50 F.Supp. 292.

42. U.S.—Ispass v. Pyramid Motor Freight Corp., C.C.A.N.Y., 152 F.2d 619, vacated in part on other grounds and remanded 67 S.Ct. 954, 330 U.S. 695, 91 L.Ed. 1184.

43. U.S.—Brown v. Minngas Co., D.C.Minn., 51 F.Supp. 363.

Exemption under Motor Carrier Act

(1) An employer engaged as motor carrier in interstate commerce could have benefit of exemptions provided by provision of Fair Labor Standards Act that maximum hours provisions of the act should not apply to employee with respect to whom interstate commerce commission has power of regulation under Motor Carrier Act, only for those particular weeks in which employer sustained burden of showing that employee spent substantial part of his time at activities connected with safety of operations. —Hutchinson v. William C. Barry, Inc., D.C.Mass., 50 F.Supp. 292.

(2) In action for overtime wages under the Fair Labor Standards Act, where plaintiff was employed as a mechanic by a contract motor carrier in both intra-state and interstate work, but the greater part of plaintiff's work was such as brought him in the class affecting the safety of operations, and as such was exempt from the act as being subject to the regulations of Interstate Commerce Commission, burden was on plaintiff to show what proportion of time was allocated to such work.—Kentucky Transport Co. v. Drake, 182 S.W.2d 960, 298 Ky. 389.

44. N.Y.—Anderson v. Material Co-Ordinating Agency, 63 N.Y.S.2d 324.

Executive capacity

In a case in which defendant had established the existence of five of the six elements of the definition of an employee "employed in a bona fide executive" capacity, it was held that the burden was on plaintiff to establish the nonexistence of the sixth element, so as to entitle him to the benefits of the act.—Zaetz v. General Instrument Corporation, 30 A.2d 504, 21 N.J.Misc. 76.

Engagement in two types of employment

In action by employee to recover overtime compensation where it appeared that employee was engaged in two types of employment, one within and one exempt from the act, burden was on employee of showing that overtime, if any, devoted to his duties was performed in the employment falling within provisions of the act.—Armour & Co. v. Carpenter, 141 P.2d 797, 193 Okl. 153.

45. U.S.—Walling v. Rockton & Rion R. R., D.C.S.C., 54 F.Supp. 342, affirmed, C.C.A., 146 F.2d 111, certiorari denied 65 S.Ct. 1026, 324 U.S. 880, 89 L.Ed. 1431.

46. U.S.—Skidmore v. John J. Casale, Inc., D.C.N.Y., 66 F.Supp. 282.

Not subject to Interstate Commerce Commission

Where employer claimed it was not a common or contract carrier in interstate commerce and employees suing for unpaid overtime compensation under Fair Labor Standards Act assented to such claim, district court, without deciding the question, would assume employer was not a carrier subject to regulation by Interstate Commerce Commission, and that employees were not exempt from operation of Fair Labor Standards Act.—Skidmore v. John J. Casale, Inc., supra.

47. Ind.—Shell Petroleum Corporation v. Earnest, 187 N.E. 211, 97 Ind.App. 483.

Nonpayment on discharge

(1) In action by discharged employee for recovery of wages due from nonrailroad corporate employer and for penalty, the employee's testimony that he requested that his check be mailed to him was admissible.—McCoy-Couch Furniture Mfg. Co. v. Zahringer, 186 S.W.2d 922, 208 Ark. 581.

(2) In filling station attendant's action for wages and penalty, testimony relating to method of operation of station was held incompetent.—Shell Petroleum Corporation v. Earnest, 187 N.E. 211, 97 Ind.App. 483.

48. N.Y.—Katz v. Film Metal Box Corporation, 47 N.Y.S.2d 454, 181 Misc. 812—Mabee v. White Plains Pub. Co., 41 N.Y.S.2d 534, 180 Misc. 8, reversed on other grounds 45 N.Y.S.2d 479, 267 App.Div. 284, affirmed 58 N.E.2d 520, 293 N.Y. 781, motion denied 60 N.E.2d 848, 294 N.Y. 701, reversed on other grounds 66 S.Ct. 511, 327 U.S. 178, 90 L.Ed. 607.

tween the employer and a union,[53] or of a decree in another action involving different parties[54] has been held inadmissible.

c. Weight and Sufficiency

(a) In general
(b) Actions under Fair Labor Standards Act

(a) In General

General rules as to the requisites and weight and sufficiency of evidence in civil cases have been applied in actions under statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof.

The rules governing the weight and sufficiency of evidence in civil actions generally have been applied in actions to enforce various statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof,[55] such as statutes providing for the payment of prevailing wages to public employees and employees on public works,[56] the payment of wages on discharge of an employee,[57] minimum wages,[58] maximum hours of service or payment for overtime,[59] and statutes as to wage discrimination against women.[60]

(b) Actions under Fair Labor Standards Act

Ordinarily, in actions for additional compensation and liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the right to recover must be established by a preponderance of the evidence.

In accordance with general rules, the right to recover additional compensation and liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act must be established by a preponderance of the evidence,[61] alto, D.C., 53 F.Supp. 829, 151 A.L.R. 1126.

53. Minn.—Pakarinen v. Butler Bros., 16 N.W.2d 769, 218 Minn. 496.

55. Ga.—Chambers v. W. L. Florence Const. Co., 36 S.E.2d 69, 73 Ga.App. 172.
Minn.—French v. Lindh-Gustafson-Klopfer Co., 13 N.W.2d 479, 216 Minn. 521.

Redemption of scrip or tokens
Possession of scrip is sufficient to make out a prima facie case for redemption, where defendants did not deny that plaintiff merchants were entitled thereto.—West Kentucky Coal Co. v. Nall, 27 S.W.2d 965, 234 Ky. 249.

56. N.Y.—Queeny v. State, 279 N.Y.S. 281, 244 App.Div. 761, followed in Adwin v. State, 279 N.Y.S. 282, 244 App.Div. 761.

Evidence held sufficient
To establish the prevailing wages of workers in the locality doing similar work.—Morrissey v. State, 274 N.Y.S. 80, 152 Misc. 192, affirmed Callahan v. State, 285 N.Y.S. 1047, 246 App.Div. 686—Campbell v. City of New York, 219 N.Y.S. 131, 128 Misc. 382, affirmed 222 N.Y.S. 779, 220 App.Div. 834, error dismissed City of New York v. Campbell, 48 S.Ct. 435, 277 U.S. 573, 72 L.Ed. 994.

Evidence held insufficient
(1) Evidence was held not to establish that defendant paid less than the current rate of wages to its employees.—State v. Midwest Constr. Co., 162 P. 1175, 99 Kan. 838.

(2) Evidence was held not to entitle plaintiff to recover on ground that prevailing wage rate was higher than wage rate at which he was paid.—Queeny v. 66. N.Y.—Mabee v. White Plains Pub. Co., 68 N.Y.S.2d 906, 271 App. Div. 1026.

Evidence held sufficient

(1) Evidence established that the regular work week of newspaper publisher's editorial employees was variable and consisted of the number of hours actually worked per week and not forty hours and hence

had been made;[67] that the purpose of an arrangement by the employer was to circumvent or avoid the provisions of the act,[68] as, by failure to make proper minimum payments;[69] or to establish various matters of defense.[70]

As to claim for overtime. The requirement of a preponderance of the evidence has been applied to proof of the fact that plaintiff worked overtime,[71] with the knowledge of the employer[72] whether particular work done or particular time spent was compensable overtime;[73] the extent of the overtime worked,[74] together with the element of the failure their overtime compensation should be computed on the basis of a regular hourly rate determined by dividing weekly salary by number of hours worked in any particular week.—Mabee v. White Plains Pub. Co., supra.

(2) Evidence established that employer maintained two rates of pay, one for hours between eight a. m. and four-thirty p. m. and the other, one and one-half times higher, for the remaining hours of the day, so that each rate was the "regular rate" and in each period, overtime compensation was required to be computed according to the applicable rate.—Roland Elec. Co. v. Black, C.C.A.Md., 163 F.2d 417.

(2) Where employee testified to all facts concerning hours of work and pay he received, leaving only a mathematical computation to be made to determine exact hourly rate of pay which attorney testifying as a witness made and stated result as based on plaintiff's testimony, plaintiff did not fail to sustain burden of proof by failing to show by substantial evidence that he was entitled to judgment based on excessive hours worked and overtime wages.—Edwards v. dence is not required;[80] and an employee's testimony from memory may be sufficient to establish a certain amount of overtime employment,[81] at least where such testimony is not inherently incredible,[82] although the employer will be given the benefit of all possible errors of recollection or other mistakes by plaintiff.[83] The employee's method of keeping time goes to the weight of the evidence;[84] and it has been held that the fact that the employees participated in the making of a false record of the time worked reflects on their credibility.[85] The fact that plaintiff made no claim for the alleged overtime worked until long after such work had been performed is a matter to be considered by the court in determining the weight to be given to plaintiff's evidence;[86] but it is not a controlling fact, although it does not assist the employee who is solely dependent on his own testimony and is interested in the cause.[87]

Where the employer fails to keep proper records, as required by the act, he cannot use such lack of records to destroy plaintiff's case, on the plea that employees have not produced complete proofs, since one should not be permitted to profit by his own wrongs;[88] and, in such case, less reliable and accurate evidence, submitted by plaintiff, may be sufficient to establish the amount to be allowed.[89] However, the failure of the employer to keep a record of overtime is not itself evidence on which plaintiff's overtime can be computed;[90] and it has been held that, even though the employer failed to keep adequate records, plaintiff's proof of the overtime worked must be reasonably definite and certain,[91] and must be established by a preponderance

Employee's lack of records

(1) An employee's lack of records of the hours he worked does not preclude recovery.—Stangler v. Calvert Mfg. Co., 63 N.Y.S.2d 469.

(2) Employer cannot complain of employee's failure to keep records of his work, since the act does not require an employee to keep such records, but does, however, require an employer to do so.—Edwards v. South Side Auto Parts Co., Mo.App., 180 S.W.2d 1015.

Testimony based on recollection

Fact that plaintiff's memory was at fault with respect to extent of overtime claimed by him, did not require dismissal of action on ground that plaintiff had not sustained burden of proving his case by preponderance of evidence, notwithstanding plaintiff's testimony was based solely upon recollection and he was not corroborated and plaintiff was awarded overtime compensation to extent court held his testimony correct.—Johnston v. Denial of recovery held warranted

In action against former employer to recover unpaid overtime compensation and liquidated damages, evidence that employee had kept no record of the hours he claimed he worked each week, that employee had accepted his wages without protest, and that for four years employee delayed asserting any claim, required denial of recovery on ground of failure to establish the fact of overtime work and quantity of overtime work each week.—Ralston v. Amount as matter of inference

(1) Where employee produces sufficient evidence to show amount of work for which employee was not properly compensated as a matter of just and reasonable inference, employer cannot complain that the damages allowed the employee lacked the exactness of measurement that would be possible had the employer kept the records required by the act. —Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., supra—Porter v. Poindexter, C.C.A.Okl., 158 F.2d 759—U. S. v. Ewald Iron Co., D.C.Ky., 67 F. Supp. 67.

(2) The trier of facts must draw whatever inferences can be drawn from the employee's evidence as to the amount of time spent in preliminary activities in excess of productive working time, unless the employer can provide accurate estimates.—Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., supra.

of the evidence.[92] Where the employer does keep adequate records, the record of an employee has been held not worthy of consideration.[93]

Purview of act; interstate commerce. The requirement of a preponderance of the evidence applies to proof that the employee is within the scope of the act,[94] in that defendant was engaged in interstate commerce,[95] or that plaintiffs were engaged in,[96] or a substantial part of their activities related to,[97] interstate commerce or the production of goods for interstate commerce.

Where an employee was engaged in both interstate and intra-state activity and is required to establish what portion of his time was devoted to interstate business, he must produce facts which amount to more than mere guess, speculation, or conjecture.[98] However, where plaintiffs prove that they worked on interstate and intra-state business, and the two classes of business were commingled in the employer's operations, and the employer did not attempt to distinguish between the two in payment of wages, a prima facie case for recovery has been established,[99] and defendant must introduce satisfactory evidence to maintain its burden.[1]

c. Verdict and findings

a. In General

While it is for the court to decide whether there is sufficient evidence to warrant submitting the case or issue to the jury, questions of fact on which the evidence is conflicting or doubtful are generally for the jury to determine.

The rules governing the determination of questions of law and fact in civil actions generally apply in actions under statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof.[9] While, in actions under the Fair Labor Standards Act, it is for the court to decide whether there is sufficient evidence to warrant submitting the case or issue to the jury,[10] and to dispose of issues on which the evidence is legally insufficient, or is undisputed and conclusive,[11] questions of fact on which the evidence is conflicting or doubtful are generally for the jury to determine.[12]

Thus it is for the jury to determine the liability of the employer,[13] what constitutes working time,[14] the number of hours worked,[15] whether the employee worked overtime[16] and the employer had knowledge thereof,[17] the amount of overtime worked,[18] whether the employee keeping the record of the overtime worked kept his own record honestly,[19] whether the employee was estopped from claiming overtime,[20] whether the employer was engaged in interstate commerce,[21] whether the employee was en-

Nonpayment of wages on discharge
Under statutes providing a penalty for the failure to pay employees on their discharge, controverted questions of fact are for the jury.—Largent v. Arkansas Northwestern R. Co., 188 S.W. 836, 125 Ark. 355—39 C.J. p 233 note 68 [a].

Standard of day's work
Where a statute provided that ten hours of actual labor shall be taken to be a day's work, and no objection was made that the employee did not work daily as much as ten hours, it is a question for the jury whether the work done in a day was by the understanding and implied agreement of the parties to be reckoned as a day's work.—Brooks v. Cotton, 48 N.H. 50, 2 Am.R. 172.

Pay for Sunday work
In action for damages by employee employed from week to week, evidence presented jury questions whether employer breached contract of hire, by reducing employee's hourly wage without notice and evaded its obligation under the statute requiring that an employee, employed on Sunday, should receive time, and a half pay, which statute formed part of the contract for hire.—Cooksey v. Beaumont Mfg. Co., 9 S.E.2d 790, 194 S.C. 395.

On motion for nonsuit and dismissal
Where defendants made motion for nonsuit, and a dismissal of complaint upon the merits at the conclusion of evidence taken by plaintiffs, court was not called to pass on disputed questions of fact but to say whether there was believable evidence that plaintiffs were engaged in employment which was not concerned with safety of operation of motortrucks.—Crean v. Plaintiff's uncontradicted testimony
Even though plaintiff's testimony as to his recollection of the amount of overtime worked was uncontradicted, his interest in the result, the fallibility of his recollection, the accuracy of his statements, and the accuracy of his memory are still to be weighed by the trier of facts.—Johnston v. § 160(11). —— Costs and Attorney's Fees

b. Actions under Fair Labor Standards Act

a. In General

Under a wage statute so providing an employee bringing action to enforce such statute is entitled to reasonable attorney's fees to be taxed as costs against the employer.

Where statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof so provide, an employee bringing an action to enforce such statute against an employer who has violated it is entitled to an allowance of reasonable attorney's fees to be paid by the employer.[37] However, the employer will not be liable for costs and attorney's fees in the event claimant is unsuccessful.[38]

b. Actions under Fair Labor Standards Act

Under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the successful employee must be allowed the costs of the action and a reasonable attorney's fee.

Under a provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act to that effect, the employee recovering a judgment for additional compensation and liquidated damages under the act must also be allowed the costs of the action and a reasonable attorney's fees.[39] This provision is mandatory[40] and the court must do so, even though it would be inclined not to do so.[41] However, costs and attorney's fees will be denied if, or to the extent that, the employee's suit is his behalf.—Grayson-McLeod Lumber Co. v. Johnson, 146 S.W. 141, 103 Ark. 266.

36. U.S.—Rogan v. Essex County News Co., D.C.N.J., 65 F.Supp. 82.

37. N.D.—Wiseth v. Traill County Telephone Co., 5 N.W.2d 307, 72 N.D. 165.

Successful party

A statute providing for allowance of attorneys' fees to successful party, whether employer or employee, in suit for recovery or collection of wages due, was not unconstitutional.—Britt v. Cotter Butte Mines, 89 P.2d 266, 108 Mont. 174.

Fee held adequate

(1) Fee of $200 allowed attorney for employee suing for wages and statutory penalties for employer's failure to pay wages on demand within twenty-four hours after termination of employment was adequate.—Bannon v. Techeland Oil Corporation, 17 So.2d 921, 205 La. 689.

(2) Where hotel waitresses demanded $1,705 under Minimum Wage Law but actually recovered a little over $200, allowance of $125 as fees for large amount of work performed by their attorney was not inadequate, since suit might possibly have been avoided.—Ferber v. Wisen, 82 P.2d 139, 195 Wash. 603.

Fee held excessive

Where total amount of recovery in action for overtime wages under Women and Minors' Employment Act was less than $600, approximately half of which was unwarranted and the case was not complicated, an allowance of attorney's fees of $250 was reduced to $150.—W. W. Mac Co. v. Teague, 180 S.W.2d 387, 297 Ky. 475.

Recovery based on another statute

Employees of munitions plant operated by private contractor under contract with government were "laborers and mechanics employed by the War Department" within meaning of act regulating hours and wages of such laborers and mechanics and were entitled to time and a half for overtime work but were not entitled to recover attorneys fees provided in Fair Labor Standards Act.—Kennedy v. Silas Mason Co., D.C.La., 68 F.Supp. 576.

Effect of findings of wage and hour division

Findings of wage and hour division of United States department of labor as to amounts due employees are merely "ministerial acts," not "judicial pronouncements" foreclosing court from fixing reasonable counsel fee in employees' pending action therefor.—Asaro v. Lilienfeld, 36 N.Y.S.2d 802.

40. U.S.—Magann v. Long's Baggage Transfer Co., D.C.Va., 39 F.Supp. 742.

Double damages

The court cannot refuse to allow attorney's fees because plaintiff recovered double damages; nor can it reduce the amount of the fee on that ground.—Hutchinson v. William C. Barry, Inc., D.C.Mass., 50 F.Supp. 292.

unsuccessful,[42] or the employee's success was not obtained through the efforts of his attorneys;[43] nor will fees be granted because of the settlement of claims by employees whom the attorney did not represent;[44] and to the extent that he is unsuccessful, costs may be taxed to the employee.[45] An employer who has violated the act cannot avoid this liability for counsel fees;[46] and an employee has been held not to lose the right to counsel fees by estoppel.[47]

It has been said that the act contemplates that the employee shall receive the full amount of any award made to him,[48] and that any contract that would allow an attorney any part of the award made to any employee would be void.[49] Ordinarily, the award of the attorney's fee is not made as a separate fee due the attorney but is merely part of the judgment in the action;[50] but it has been held that the act endows the attorney for the employee with a direct interest in the fee, so that the attorney can file a petition for the allowance of an additional fee without his client joining in the petition.[51]

The determination of the amount of attorney's fees is a matter within the discretion of the court,[52] which will not be interfered within the absence of an abuse of discretion;[53] and the court may determine the fee alone, without submitting the matter to the jury,[54] or may permit the jury to find as a separate item the amount of reasonable attorney's 42. Mass.—Campanale v. General Ice Cream Corporation, 49 N.E.2d 1018, 314 Mass. 387.

Part of claim barred

An employee seeking unpaid wages and overtime under Fair Labor Standards Act from a Louisiana employer would be denied attorney's fees with respect to that part of employee's claim which was barred by limitation.—Divine v. Levy, D.C. La., 45 F.Supp. 49.

Employee paid in full

Where employer did not believe, during the employment, that employee was within Wages and Hour Law or Fair Labor Standards Act, and it was doubtful whether employee so considered himself, and at time of employee's discharge employer paid employee all amounts due him, including overtime pay, employee could not subsequently sue for liquidated damages and attorney's fees on theory that overtime compensation was payable weekly or at least twice a month and hence due before actual payment at time of discharge.—Clour v. Jones, D.C.Okl., 42 F.Supp. 700.

Employer's successful appeal

Where it was necessary for employer to prosecute an appeal to correct judgment of lower court by reducing amount of employee's recovery, application of employee's attorney for allowance of additional attorney's fees for his services rendered in appellate court would be denied.—S. H. Robinson & Co. v. Larue, 156 S.W.2d 359, 25 Tenn.App. 284, affirmed 156 S.W.2d 432, 178 Tenn. 197.

43. U.S.—Mortenson v. Western Light & Telephone Co., D.C.Iowa, 42 F.Supp. 319.

Success based on defendant's admission

Where judgment in favor of plaintiff was only for certain overtime, which employer admitted he was entitled to and for which no claim was made in the petition, plaintiff was not entitled to attorney's fees.—Mortenson v. Western Light & Telephone Co., supra.

Employer's offer as insufficient

Where employer in general terms offered to settle the case before it was decided, but never made any firm offer, it could not be said that employer offered to avoid the need of incurring attorney's fees or that a fee was not a reasonable element of plaintiff's damage.—Aucoin v. Mystic Waste Co., D.C.Mass., 55 F.Supp. 672.

44. Tenn.—Hunt v. National Linen Service Corporation, 157 S.W.2d 608, 178 Tenn. 262.

Representative action

In action by one employee on behalf of all employees who might seek to join the action, attorneys could not recover fees merely because other employees, whom they did not represent, had settled their possible claims against employer.—Hunt v. National Linen Service Corporation, supra.

46. N.Y.—Katz v. Film Metal Box Corporation, 47 N.Y.S.2d 454, 181 Misc. 812.

Good faith; settlement

Neither good faith nor a settlement can justify a court in refusing an award of attorney's fees in an action under the act.—Greenberg v. Arsenal Bldg. Corporation, D.C.N.Y., 50 F.Supp. 700, modified on other grounds, C.C.A., 144 F.2d 292, reversed on other grounds 65 S.Ct. 895, 324 U.S. 697, 89 L.Ed. 1296.

Offer of payment

Defense pleading employers' good faith offer to pay to employees overtime without damages and attorney's fees was insufficient to absolve employer from paying attorney's fees.—Garrity v. Bagold Corporation, 42 N.Y.S.2d 257, 180 Misc. 120, modified on other grounds 46 N.Y.S.2d 637, 267 App.Div. 353.

fees following the introduction of evidence on such subject.[55] The provision does not contemplate an amount in the nature of a speculative or contingent fee, but merely one that is reasonable under all the circumstances;[56] and, where bona fide issues of law or fact exist, attorney's fees should not be made larger than is reasonably required in order to secure the remedial purposes of the act.[57] The court will determine the fee in the same manner as it would have determined it if the employee were sued by his counsel for a fee.[58] It has been held proper for the court to fix the costs or attorney's fees in accordance with a state statute allowing such fees as part of the costs;[59] and in such case the attorney may have a claim against his client for a reasonable fee in addition to that allowed by the court pursuant to the state statute.[60] Moreover, it has also been held that reasonable attorney's fees may be allowed under the federal act in addition to the fee included in such statutory costs.[61]

What is a proper fee in any given case depends on all the facts and circumstances of the case,[62] and the factors to be considered include the character of the presentation by plaintiff's counsel,[63] the importance of the questions considered to other employees to whom the act may become the subject of litigation,[64] the standing and reputation of the attorney,[65] the amount of time and effort required,[66] and the amount recovered by the employee or employees.[67] The court may consider the number of claims presented,[68] the fact that counsel was required to travel in order to present his case,[69] and the fact that the cause was,[70] or probably would be,[71] appealed. It has also been held that the court may consider whether defendant's violation of the act was willful, deliberate, or flagrant.[72] A contract between the employee and his attorney as to the amount of attorney's fees will not affect the court in its determination of a reasonable fee.[73]

73. U.S.—Aucoin v. Mystic Waste Co., D.C.Mass., 55 F.Supp. 672.

The hardship on employers involved in litigating claims when the applicability of the statute was uncertain has been held no reason for limiting the fee of plaintiff's attorneys to less than fair compensation for their work;[74] but it has also been held that the fact that there was a serious doubt whether the employee was within the act, and that the employee never claimed to be subject to the act or to be entitled to additional compensation until after his services had been dispensed with, are matters entitled to weight in fixing the attorney's fees.[75]

In the application of these factors to particular cases, various amounts have been awarded by the courts[76] and the propriety of particular awards has

Effect of agreements generally

The Fair Labor Standards Act does not prohibit an employee from paying, or his lawyer from charging, more than the court awards as reasonable attorney's fees, but, where the agreement between employee and counsel sets a figure higher than what the court considers a reasonable fee, the agreement is not relevant, and, where the agreement sets a figure lower than what the court considers a reasonable fee, the excess would not represent damages sustained by employee, and might not fall within provision of the act for reasonable fee.—Aucoin v. Mystic Waste Co., supra.

Contract for excessive fee

If an employee makes a contract with his attorney under which attorney will receive excessive fee, the court is not required to fix accordingly the fee allowable to the employee if he is successful in the suit.—Hutchinson v. William C. Barry, Inc., D.C.Mass., 50 F.Supp. 292.

(1) On verdict of $346.—Sermond v. Lotz, 47 A.2d 432, 24 N.J.Misc. 182.

(2) On recovery of $164, and an equal amount as liquidated damages. —Fox v. Armour & Co., 33 A.2d 582, 21 N.J.Misc. 262.

(3) On recovery of $103, and an equal amount as liquidated damages. —Clay v. Motor Freight Express, D. C.Pa., 52 F.Supp. 948.

77. Kan.—Sykes v. Lochmann, 132 P.2d 620, 156 Kan. 223, certiorari denied Lochmann v. Sykes, 63 S. Ct. 1165, 319 U.S. 753, 87 L.Ed. 1707.

Discretion held not abused

(1) In general.—E. C. Schroeder Co. v. Clifton, C.C.A.Okl., 153 F.2d 385, certiorari denied 66 S.Ct. 1351, 328 U.S. 858, 90 L.Ed. 1629, and 66 S.Ct. 1353, 328 U.S. 858, 90 L.Ed. 1629, rehearing denied 67 S.Ct. 33, 329 U.S. 821, 91 L.Ed. 699—E. H. Clarke Lumber Co. v. Kurth, C.C.A. Or., 152 F.2d 914.

(2) Award of $1,000 as attorney's fees, in action in which a judgment for $13,948.04 was recovered, was not unreasonable.—Agnew v. Johnson, 176 S.W.2d 489, 352 Mo. 222.

(3) Where total amount of judgment was $4,938.36, trial court did not abuse its discretion in rendering an additional judgment against employer for attorneys' fees in the sum of $2,000.—Sykes v. Lochmann, 132 P.2d 620, 156 Kan. 223, certiorari denied Lochmann v. Sykes, 63 S.Ct. 1165, 319 U.S. 753, 87 L.Ed. 1707.

(4) $7,000 was a reasonable attorney's fee where employees recovered $18,630.—Skidmore v. John J. Casale, Inc., C.C.A.N.Y., 160 F.2d 527.

(5) In action under Fair Labor Standards Act where first attorney obtained a default judgment for overtime amounting to $823.00 and second attorney thereafter represented plaintiff, allowance of total fee for $751.40 without any attempt to allocate it between the attorneys did no constitute an abuse of discretion. —Ferraro v. Arthur M. Rosenberg Co. of New Haven, Conn., C.C.A. Conn., 156 F.2d 212.

78. Fees held inadequate

(1) Allowance of $100 attorney's fees, to plaintiff in suit in which amount of recovery was about $900, was increased to $200, in view of services performed.—Barrineau v. Carolina Milling Co., D.C.S.C., 52 F. Supp. 197.

(2) Award of $750 as fees for plaintiff's attorneys in action resulting in recovery of more than $10,000 was inadequate, and judgment was modified by increasing attorney's fees to $1,250.—Greenberg v. Arsenal Bldg. Corporation, C.C.A.N.Y., 144 F. 2d 292, affirmed 65 S.Ct. 895, 324 U.S. 697, 89 L.Ed. 1296.

Fees held not inadequate

(1) $500 attorney's fees plus $300 in event of appeal was not so grossly inadequate as to constitute an abuse of discretion.—E. C. Schroeder Co. v. Clifton, C.C.A.Okl., 153 F.2d 385, certiorari denied 66 S.Ct. 1351, 328 U.S. 858, 90 L.Ed. 1629, and 66 S. Ct. 1353, 328 U.S. 858, 90 L.Ed. 1629, rehearing denied 67 S.Ct. 33, 329 U. S. 821, 91 L.Ed. 699.

(2) Where $400 allowed as attorney's fees exceeded the amount of overtime compensation recovered, only four witnesses were called in the case, and there was practically no dispute in the evidence, the fee allowed was not inadequate compensation for services both in District Court and on appeal.—Mid-Continent Petroleum Corp. v. Keen, C.C.A.Iowa, 157 F.2d 310.

(3) Where plaintiff's attorney obtained a judgment for $375.10 in municipal court of the city of New York and counsel fees of $250, and obtained an affirmance of that judgment after modification of the appellate term with an additional fee of $150, plaintiff's counsel was denied an additional fee for services in securing an affirmance in the appellate division.—Koerner v. Associated Linen Laundry Suppliers, 62 N.Y.S.2d 774, 270 App.Div. 986.

(4) The allowance of $250 for attorney's fees to employee recovering $629.72 for overtime compensation and an equal amount for liquidated damages was not so clearly insufficient as to amount to an injustice, but would be increased by an additional $250 for services necessary in connection with employer's appeal, where allowance was not intended to cover services beyond trial court.—Dumas v. King, C.C.A.Ark., 157 F.2d 463.

79. Fees held excessive

(1) Amount awarded as attorney's fees was reduced from approximately sixty-five per cent of wages recovered to an allowance of ten per cent of total recovery, in view of circumstances.—Fiedler v. Potter, 172 S.W.2d 1007, 180 Tenn. 176.

(2) Where judgments for two employees were for $1,030.20 and for $1,626.00, and case was a matter of first impression, so as to entail greater labor in preparation, but attorneys for wage and hour division aided in preparation of briefs and argument of all preliminary matters in the trial court, an aggregate allowance of $750 for attorney's fees was excessive, and the most that could reasonably have been allowed was $450.—Niehaus v. Joseph Greenspon's Son Pipe Corporation, 164 S. W.2d 180, 237 Mo.App. 112.

Fees held not excessive

(1) In general.—Ashenford v. L. Yukon & Sons Produce Co., 172 S.W. 2d 881, 237 Mo.App. 1241.

(2) Where action was brought in behalf of more than fifty separate claimants and most of them recovered, award of $750 as attorneys' fees was not objectionably excessive notwithstanding aggregate amount of overtime compensation and liquidated damages and attorneys' fees was $1,295.92.—Mid-Continent Pipe Line Co. v. Hargrave, C.C.A.Okl., 129 F.2d 655.

§ 160(12). —— Damages and Amount of Recovery

In actions by an employee under a statute regulating wages or the payment thereof, plaintiff is entitled to recover earned wages and any additional sum or penalty provided for by the statute.

In an action by an employee to enforce a statute regulating wages or the payment thereof, plaintiff is entitled to recover any earned wages that may be due and owing under, or apart from, the statute, plus any additional sum or penalty in so far as the statute may provide therefor.[80] In actions under the Fair Labor Standards Act plaintiff will be granted recovery not only for the amount of unpaid minimum wages and overtime compensation due, but also for liquidated damages.[81] In an action for earned wages brought under a statute providing that, on employer's failure to pay wages on demand on employee's discharge or resignation, the employer shall be liable for full wages from the time of such demand until payment or tender of the amount due, the employee can recover the statutory penalty only up to the date when the employer tendered payment.[82] A public employee suing for the difference between the wages received and the wages he was entitled to at the prevailing rate pursuant to statute is entitled to recover only from the time of filing his complaint with the proper fiscal officer.[83]

The amount of the recovery granted in an action for unpaid minimum wages or overtime wages under a statute providing for minimum and overtime wages,[84] such as the Fair Labor Standards Act,[85] should be in accord with the proof, plaintiff being entitled to recover overtime pay under some statutes, at the rate of one and one-half times his regular hourly rate, for each hour worked in excess of forty hours in each week.[86] Since the rule that precludes

Settlement not at issue

In action against employer for alleged violation of Fair Labor Standards Act, court refused to allow double damages to employees under prior settlement between parties, where such settlement was not at issue in the action, and no claims for such damages were made until court was ready to write opinion on issues submitted.—Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., D.C.Mich., 60 F.Supp. 146, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., Mt. Clemens Pottery Co. v. Anderson, 149 F.2d 461, reversed on other grounds 66 S.Ct. 1187, 328 U.S. 680, 90 L.Ed. 1515, rehearing denied 67 S.Ct. 25, 329 U.S. 822, 91 L.Ed. 699.

Sufficiency of tender of wages

Discharged employee was entitled to recover earned wages, with statutory penalties, for nonpayment thereof, only until date of tender of wages earned, not until date of payment or tender of both wages and penalties.—Hazel v. Robinson & Young, 174 So. 105, 187 La. 51.

Improper demand

Defendant's tender of correct amount due under employment contract after repeated demands for greater sum was held not to subject defendant to statutory penalties for time between first demand and tender.—Duke v. Ford, Bacon & Davis, 138 So. 675, 19 La.App. 27.

Verdict held not excessive

In action under Fair Labor Standards Act to recover for unpaid minimum wages and overtime, even if there was evidence that plaintiff performed certain duties on purely intrastate business, verdict would not be set aside as grossly excessive because exact time spent by plaintiff in acting as watchman for goods in interstate commerce could not be separated from time spent in such duties as to intrastate commerce.—Ashenford v. L. Yukon & Sons Produce Co., 172 S.W.2d 881, 237 Mo.App. 1241.

Erroneous computation by employee

When an employee sues for recovery of overtime compensation and liquidated damages under the Fair Labor Standards Act and in his complaint states the total amount claimed and it develops that the employee's computations were made on a mistaken and erroneous basis, and where there is no surprise so far as employer is concerned, court may allow recovery within amount claimed, computed on proper and correct basis.—Keen v. the recovery of uncertain and speculative damages applies only to situations where the fact of damage is itself uncertain, as discussed in Damages § 28, recovery under the Fair Labor Standards Act will not be precluded where the uncertainty lies only in the amount of damages arising from the statutory violation by the employer.[87] It has been held that collective bargaining agreements under which employees received wage increases should not be considered in mitigation of damages.[88]

Interest. The general rules governing the allowance of interest as damages in civil actions have been held to apply in actions to enforce statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof, in the absence of provisions in the statute to the contrary.[89] Since the purpose of the provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act allowing liquidated damages was to grant compensation for delay in payment of sums due under the act,[90] an employee who obtains a judgment for unpaid minimum or overtime wages and liquidated damages under the act is not entitled to interest on the amount so recovered.[91] However, the judgment itself will bear interest at the legal rate from the date of the judgment until it is paid.[92]

Credits or deductions. In determining the amount of recovery to be awarded, the employer is entitled to be credited with payments made which the employee's claim has not recognized;[93] and it has been held that in an action under the Fair Labor Standards Act the amount of such payments should be deducted from the amount of wages due before any calculation of the additional amount as liquidated damages,[94] although it has also been held that the deduction should be made from the combined total

Employer keeping inadequate records

Where employer sued for unpaid minimum wages or unpaid overtime compensation has kept inadequate records, and employee has produced sufficient evidence to show amount of work for which employee was not properly compensated as a matter of just and reasonable inference, the rule precluding recovery of uncertain and speculative damages does not prevent the awarding of damages to employee.—Anderson v. Wisen, supra.

(2) In an action for the difference between wages received and wages at the prevailing rate, pursuant to statute, laborers were entitled to interest from date of original determinations by city comptroller of back wages due such laborers, notwithstanding absence of provision in statute for allowance of interest on back wages found due.—Giannettino v. § 160(13). Criminal Prosecutions

Except in so far as the specific statute may otherwise provide, the general rules of criminal procedure apply in prosecutions for offenses against statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof.

Offenses against statutes regulating wages or the payment thereof and providing for criminal liability for their violation should be prosecuted under, and in accordance with, the general rules of criminal procedure and the provisions of the statute.[98] Attorneys of the administrator of the wage and hour division do not have the power or duty to institute and prosecute criminal prosecutions for violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act;[99] and, likewise, a state administrative official, even though authorized by the administrator to investigate the employer's business, lacks the authority to prosecute an employer for violation of the act.[1]

Payment on release

Where fifty dollars was paid employee and inserted in release on his discharge to cover any overtime employee had worked in excess of fifty-four hours per week as provided in contract of employment, and thereafter district court found that employee was entitled to one hundred sixteen dollars and six cents for overtime in excess of fifty-four hours per week under Fair Labor Standards Act, which overtime had not been reported to employer, district court properly deducted the fifty dollars already paid and then allowed a like sum as liquidated damages under the act, as against employee's contention that district court should have first doubled the one hundred sixteen dollars and six cents and then deducted the fifty dollars.—Bergschneider v. Peabody Coal Co., C.C.A.Ill., 142 F.2d 784.

Straight time paid for overtime work

Under statutes as to time of payment

(1) Prosecution for failure to pay discharged employees' wages may be maintained without civil judgment having been obtained against employer.—Ex parte Samaha, 19 P.2d 839, 130 Cal.App. 116.

(2) Even though a provision of the law gives an employer who is unable to pay the wages as required a period of time within which he may comply with an alternative requirement, an indictment may be returned before the expiration of such time when it is alleged that the employer was able to pay as required by the statute.—Commonwealth v. Hillside Coal Co., 58 S.W. 441, 109 Ky. 47, 22 Ky.L. 559—39 C.J. p 229 note 99.

Under anti-tipping statute

Where a statute in one sentence imposes a penalty on the company, its manager, officer, or agent in charge, for allowing a tip to be given, and in a succeeding sentence imposes a penalty for failure to post a notice of the act only on the company, an indictment against a manager for failure to post the act cannot be upheld.—State v. (2) Allegations in complaint in misdemeanor prosecution for failure to pay wages in violation of labor code, that defendant had ability to pay wages which were owing to, and were demanded by, employee who quit, and that defendant refused to pay with intent to delay and defraud employee, were sufficient to confer jurisdiction on justice court, notwithstanding absence of allegation that defendant falsely denied amount or validity of wage claim or that wage was due.—Ex parte Trombley, 178 P.2d 510, review denied 178 P.2d 513.

(3) Count of complaint alleging that employer on certain date continued to employ one or more workers in and about a sawmill without maintaining semimonthly or two monthly pay days, and particularly without paying such employees in full for their services for previous semimonthly period on or before such date, and count of complaint alleging that employer failed to post and keep posted in a conspicuous place at place of employment or elsewhere where employees could see it, or at office or nearest agency for payment kept by employer, any notice specifying any regular pay day or pay days, was held sufficiently to allege violation of provisions of semimonthly pay day law.—Ex parte Moffett, 64 P.2d 1190, 19 Cal.App.2d 7.

Indictment or information held sufficient

An indictment charging violations of Fair Labor Standards Act, in that defendants transported pulpwood produced for interstate commerce and in the production of which producers paid employees substandard wages, was sufficient without an allegation that defendants caused the transporting and delivering through others, or whether by rail or truck. —U. Extent to which motion granted

Where indictment charged violations of Fair Labor Standards Act, in that defendants transported pulpwood produced for interstate commerce, and in the production of which producers paid employees substandard wages, defendamts' motion for bill of particulars would be granted to extent of requiring giving of names of contractors or sellers who produced pulpwood, but government would not be required to give names of all employees who allegedly received substandard wages.—U. Under kick-back statute

In prosecution for violation of "kick-back" statute, even though wage agreement allegedly violated need not recite that wages constitute the prevailing rate, mere showing that agreement specifies a particular rate and that a "kick-back" was received is not sufficient, and prevailing rate of wages must be proved.—People, on Complaint of Falzia, v. Meyer, supra.

Notice of violation

Employer's conviction for violating act requiring biweekly payment of wages was held reversible error on not prove immaterial or unnecessary matter.[11]

Evidence. In accordance with general rules in criminal prosecutions, as discussed in Criminal Law §§ 566–599, presumptions and inferences arising from the facts and circumstances of the case will be indulged;[12] and the burden is on the prosecution to establish the existence of each of the essential elements of the offense charged.[13] In order to be admissible, the evidence offered must be competent, relevant, and material to the issues involved.[14] The prosecution must establish beyond a reasonable doubt the guilt of one accused of a violation of a statute regulating wages or the payment thereof,[15] such as the Fair Labor Standards Act,[16] statutes penalizing the failure to pay wages, or to pay by a specified time,[17] statutes providing for the payment of prevailing wages to public employees or employees on public works,[18] or statutes prohibiting a kick-back, rebate, or refund of wages.[19] need not be determined.[22] Where the evidence is conflicting or doubtful, questions of fact ordinarily are for the jury,[23] under proper instructions by the court.[24]

Sentence and punishment. Where the penalty or punishment for a violation of a statute regulating wages or the payment thereof is prescribed by the statute itself, such prescription is controlling,[25] and provisions for punishment of crimes generally are inapplicable.[26] Under the provision of the Fair Labor Standards Act to that effect, no person is to be imprisoned under the act except for an offense committed after the conviction of such person for a prior offense under the act,[27] and a former conviction is a matter for the consideration of the judge alone, in imposing sentence;[28] but it has been held that an imprisonment cannot be imposed except in those cases where a second offense has not only been committed, but where the indictment or information charges the fact.[29]

III. MEDICAL, SURGICAL, AND HOSPITAL ATTENTION; RELIEF FUNDS

§ 161. Medical or Surgical Attendance

An employer's duties and liabilities in connection with supplying its employees with medical attention are discussed infra §§ 162–166.

§ 162. —— Duty of Employer in General

In the absence of statute or contract an employer is not required to supply medical services to its employees except in an emergency where it is imperatively demanded to save life or serious injury.

In the absence of a statutory or contractual obligation there is, as a general rule, no duty resting on the employer to provide surgical or medical attendance or medicine for an employee who is injured or becomes ill while in its employment,[30] even though such injury or illness results from the employer's

The custom of employees to come to plant long before scheduled time for beginning of their work was one of the realities of the industry in the light of which employer's intent and attitude in computing employees' time should be considered in prosecution for willfully violating Fair Labor Standards Act.—U. Extent of overtime worked

In prosecution for violations of Fair Labor Standards Act, determination of extent of overtime work for which defendant's employees were not compensated pursuant to act was unnecessary, and fact that employees were piece workers and were compensated for amount of work done was immaterial.—U. Evidence held to present jury question

Evidence presented question for jury as to whether defendant's alleged violations of Fair Labor Standards Act were willful, so as to be punishable under the act, where there were circumstances which tended to show that defendant made a plan to circumvent the act before it went into effect and suggested a similar plan to an employer of labor who logged defendant's sawmill.—Darby v. A labor contractor employing convicts is not bound to make frequent inspection of the convicts for minor ailments as sore feet and ankles, having a right to assume that the convicts will make the matter known.—Pratt Consol. Coal Co. v. Bozeman, 68 So. 887, 192 Ala. 546.

Municipal employees

A city is under no legal duty to provide hospitalization or to pay for hospitalization for an injured policeman, and acts out of generosity in making such payments.—Goldwater v. Citizens Casualty Co. of New York, 7 N.Y.S.2d 242, affirmed 36 N.Y.S.2d 413.

Railway carrier owes no duty to provide medical treatment to employee who becomes sick in service.—Cortes v. Baltimore Insular Line, C.C.A.N.Y., 52 F.2d 22, reversed on other grounds 53 S.Ct. 173, 287 U.S. 367, 77 L.Ed. 368.

Injury not arising out of or in course of employment negligence,[31] except perhaps in a case in which the employee gives his services without compensation.[32]

It is the duty of the employer, however, to provide medical or surgical assistance in the case of an emergency where it is imperatively demanded to save life or to prevent further serious bodily injury.[33] Where in the course of his employment a servant suffers serious injury or is suddenly stricken down in a manner indicating immediate and emergent need of aid to save him from death or serious harm, the master, if present, is bound to take such reasonable measure or make such reasonable effort as may be practicable to relieve him[34] even though the master is not chargeable with fault in bringing about the emergency[35] or the injury occurred through the employee's own negligence.[36] Hence, it has been held that a railroad company in the absence of any contract obligation or a statute regulating the subject is under a legal duty to use reasonable care in furnishing medical aid and suitable attention to its employees who are injured in the course of their employment, although the injury may not have been caused by the negligence of the company,[37] and there is authority in behalf of extending this rule to all employers engaged in hazardous businesses.[38]

Reasonable care. Where an employer is under a duty imposed by law to supply attention and medical care to an ill or injured employee, it must use reasonable care in the discharge of such duty,[39] and its duty is fully discharged by the exercise of such care.[40] The master is not liable to an injured servant by reason of the fact that he is taken to a public hospital against his will where the master is not shown to have authorized such act,[41] nor is the master liable for the treatment of the injured employee at the hospital where it is not shown that such treatment was by an agent of the master.[42] In any event, in order to hold the master liable for damages resulting from failure to exercise diligence and provide proper medical or surgical assistance, such failure must be the proximate cause of the injury.[43]

Statutory requirements. A statute requiring the master in certain designated employments to keep at hand specified material for the first aid of injured employees has been held valid,[44] although where penal in character it is to be strictly construed,[45] and a violation of its provisions gives rise to a cause of action[46] for an injury proximately caused thereby.[47]

The duty of an employer to supply his employees with medical services under workmen's compensation statutes is discussed in Workmen's Compensation Acts § 266 et seq, also 71 C.J. p 773 note 35 et seq.

§ 163. —— Contracts to Furnish Services

a. In general
b. Contract with third person

a. In General

An employer may contract to supply his employees with medical attention, and is liable in damages for a breach of such contract.

The employer, by a contract with the employee, may become bound to furnish him with medical or surgical attention[48] and will be liable in damages to the employee for a breach of such obligation.[49] Where the master contracts to furnish the employee free transportation to a hospital[50] and to furnish an order or permit which will admit an ill or injured employee to such hospital,[51] or where an agreement to furnish transportation may be implied,[52] any violation of the contract in such respect will render him liable for any damages which ensue therefrom. Where the employer in return for a stipulated deduction from the employee's wages agrees to furnish hospital accommodations and skilled and competent physicians and surgeons, it is liable to the employee for a breach of such contract when it fails to furnish such services,[53] and, although a hospital is conducted nominally by a hospital association composed of the employees, the master may be liable on contract because of his failure to furnish hospital services where payment of assessments for the support of the hospital is obligatory on his employees and they have no part in its management or control.[54]

Sufficiency and validity. A contract to furnish medical services may arise from the retention by the employer of a portion of the wages of the employee for that purpose.[55] A provision in the rules and regulations of a hospital department in which it is stated that employees in accordance with the rules are entitled to the benefits provided by the hospital department does not amount to a contract on the part of the employer to furnish such facilities,[56] and the employer is not responsible for the refusal or failure of those in charge of the hospital to give the employee proper service.[57] It has been held that a foreman who has power to hire and discharge employees has presumptive authority to bind the master by a statement as to the benefits employees are to receive in cash of sickness or injury, although different from that set forth in the rules of the company.[58]

Construction and operation. While a contract to furnish medical services in the future has some of the characteristics of a contract of insurance,[59] it is not technically such a contract.[60] So a hospital association formed to provide medical and surgical treatment for its members who are the employees of a particular employer has been held a mutual benefit association rather than an insurance company,[61] and its contracts with its members cannot be regarded or construed as contracts of insurance,[62] and, where the circumstances of the illness of the employee necessitate his treatment other than by the physicians of the association or at its hospital, he cannot recover the expenses thereof from the association.[63]

Where the contract requires the employer to furnish the employee with transportation to a hospital, due diligence in furnishing such transportation within a reasonable time is all that is required,[64] and where an employer contracts to supply its employees with medical services its obligation is to furnish such services as are practicable and reasonable[65] for such time as may be required,[66] and under such contract the use made by the employer of the funds collected from its employees and the fact that the employer received no personal benefit are immaterial.[67] It has been held that the employer is not required to pay for hospital or medical services apart from those provided by it,[68] nor is it required to furnish the services of a specialist.[69] Where the employer has contracted to furnish medical attention in return for a deduction from the employees' pay, it cannot by secret rules or rules not communicated to them change its obligation.[70] Where, however, the employer does not contract to supply medical or hospital services but simply deducts a sum from wages for medical services, it does not thereby assume a personal liability to supply such services, but its duty is limited to the proper administration of the fund collected[71] and it need not expend more than such sum.[72]

Notice of necessity. In order that the employer may be held liable for his failure to furnish medical attention, he must have had notice of the necessity therefor.[73] Notwithstanding the injury is not received during actual working hours, notice of the injury to the foreman of the company in charge of the force of men of which the injured employee was a part is notice to the company.[74]

Right to procure services elsewhere. Where the employer fails to furnish the services agreed on, the employee may procure them elsewhere and recover the reasonable cost thereof from the employer.[75] He must, however, apply to the employer for the services stipulated for,[76] and it is his duty to use reasonable diligence to find the employer's physician and request his services before employing another physician.[77] Where the physician arranged for by the employer is not at hand, the right of the employee to summon another physician depends on what is reasonable under the circumstances and the urgency of the case.[78]

Damages. The measure of damages for breach of a contract to furnish medical services is the amount which it might reasonably have cost plaintiff to obtain the same benefits.[79] Recovery may also be had for injuries which are the proximate result of the failure to furnish prompt medical attention, such as pain and suffering[80] and aggravation of the illness or injury.[81] However, the recovery of consequential damages for the breach of contract to supply medical attention is limited to injuries of which the breach is the proximate cause,[82] and in applying this rule the court is guided by the rules applicable in negligence cases, particularly malpractice cases.[83] Where death occurred after the failure to supply medical attention, it has been held that the causal relation between the breach of contract and the death is too uncertain, speculative, and conjectural to permit recovery of damages for the death.[84]

Actions. It has been held that where the employer fails to furnish medical services in accordance with his contract the action should be brought in contract and not in tort,[85] but it has also been held that an action in tort lies for the damage caused by the failure to perform the contract.[86] The physician employed by the employer may not, it has been held, be joined as a party.[87] The complaint must contain a clear, concise, intelligible statement of a cause of action,[88] and must allege the existence of a contract[89] and that plaintiff has performed his obligations under the contract.[90] The complaint may properly allege plaintiff's efforts to mitigate his damages[91] and may set forth the proximate damages of the failure to perform the contract.[92]

Plaintiff has the burden of proving all of the essential elements of his cause of action[93] and that the breach of contract was the proximate cause of the injury for which recovery is sought.[94] General rules apply as to the admissibility[95] and weight and sufficiency[96] of the evidence and as to instructions.[97]

As in other actions, questions of fact are for the jury.[98] Where the action is to recover for money expended by the employee in securing the services of a physician, the question whether the employee used due diligence in seeking the services of the physician designated by the employer is a mixed question of law and fact for the jury to determine under proper instructions.[99] So, whether the purpose of the deduction of "hospital fees" from an employee's wages, as provided for in the contract, was to meet the expense of an employee's sickness is for the jury, where defendant contends that a deduction was made for other reasons,[1] and, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries resulting from the employer's breach of contract to furnish medical attendance, the question whether the damages alleged are the result of defendant's breach is for the jury.[2]

b. Contract with Third Person

An employer may arrange a contract between its employees and another for such other to furnish its employees with medical services.

Where the employer arranges a contract between its employees and another for the supplying of medical service to the employees, the employer is not liable for a failure to supply medical services where its only obligation under the contract is to make deductions from wages and transmit the funds and it has performed such obligation.[3] As a supplement to the contracts discussed in Workmen's Compensation Acts § 266, whereby an employer required by the statute to furnish his employees certain medical services discharges his liability by contracting with another to supply his employees such services, the employer may arrange for a contract between such other and his employees for the furnishing of medical services for injuries and illnesses not covered by the statute[4] and in such case the two contracts are to be construed together in the light of the statute.[5]

§ 164. —— Voluntary Assumption of Duty

Where an employer voluntarily undertakes the care of an ill or injured employee, it is bound to act with reasonable care.

Where, although not under an obligation to do so, the master undertakes the relief of an injured or incapacitated servant, it is bound to act with reasonable care so that the injury to the servant shall not be increased;[6] the employer in such case is bound to the same measure of care as though the duty existed.[7] Where the employer undertakes to transport the ill or injured employee, it is liable for injury due to the negligence of another employee intrusted with the duty of transporting the injured employee.[8] The wishes of the injured man, if he is capable of understanding conditions, should be respected and such convenient and practicable arrangements made as he desires,[9] and where the adult members of his family are present when the accident occurs or come to him before his removal, or at any time thereafter, and

Assumption of duty by agent

Where employer was under no duty to furnish medical aid to employee because it did not appear that employee was in immediate need thereof, statement of employer's agent, after delivering employee to his home into custody of his wife, that he would get a doctor, was held not to place employer under duty to furnish such medical attention.—Gypsy Oil Co. v. express a desire to take charge of the injured employee, the servants of the employer present at the time should deliver over to them the care of the case and do as they advise.[10]

§ 165. —— Liability of Employer for Negligent Treatment

As a general rule, an employer who supplies an employee with medical services is required to use due care in selecting a physician, but is not liable for the physician's negligence.

Where, in the absence of a statute or a contractual obligation, the master undertakes gratuitously to furnish medical attention to an employee, it is bound to exercise reasonable care in the selection of a competent physician or other qualified person to render the services and attention required[11] and in continuing him in his employ,[12] and is liable for an injury caused by the malpractice of the physician where he has failed to exercise such care;[13] but, where it has exercised such care, it is not, according to the weight of authority, liable for the physician's negligence or lack of skill,[14] since a physician is not a servant within the doctrine of respondeat superior, but is an independent contractor.[15] However, there is some authority that the employer is liable for the physician's negligence,[16] and it has been held that, where an employer maintains a safety and health department and directs his employees to go to it for treatment in case of injury, the employer is liable for the negligence of a physician employed in such department,[17] and this has also been held true as to the negligence of a nurse,[18] although the act of the nurse may be such as to constitute the unlawful practice of medicine.[19]

Liability same as though acting under duty

The statutory provision that employer shall not be liable for any act in connection with treatment or malpractice in treatment of employee's injuries does not preclude action by employee against employer to recover damages for injuries, caused by negligent treatment of his injured eye by person in charge of employer's first aid station, on ground of employer's negligence in selecting and employing unskilled, incompetent person to care for injured employees.—Vesel v. Rule not absolute

19. Mo.—Ebert v. Emerson Electric Mfg. Co., supra.

It has been held, where a physician is employed by the master and the relation of physician and patient does not exist between him and the servant, that the rule of respondeat superior applies and the master may be liable for his negligence,[20] and where medical services are furnished, not for the employee's benefit, but primarily for the employer's benefit, the employer is liable for the negligence of the physician.[21] In any event, in order to hold the employer liable for the negligent treatment of the employee, such negligence must be established,[22] and the complaint must positively and directly allege the facts imposing liability.[23] Where the evidence is conflicting the question of negligence and other fact questions are for the jury.[24]

Employer under duty to furnish medical attention. Where the employer is under a legal, contractual, or statutory duty to furnish medical or surgical attention, the measure of its duty according to some authorities is the use of ordinary care to furnish a reasonably competent physician,[25] and it is not liable for the negligence of the physician.[26] According to other authorities, where the employer agrees to furnish competent and skilled treatment for illness or injuries suffered while in service, it is, where the employee is injured by reason of its neglect to perform such duty, liable to the employee to the same extent that the physician would be were he sued for the injury.[27] In any event liability may not be imposed where neither negligence, malpractice, nor breach of contract is established,[28] since an undertaking to supply medical service is not an undertaking to cure.[29]

Deductions from wages of employees or collection of fees. Where, without profit to itself, the employer deducts fees from the wages of the employees for the provision of medical services or hospital attention and the entire fund is administered for the benefit of the employees, the employer is, according to the generally accepted rule, liable for ordinary care in the selection and retention of physicians,[30] and where it exercises such care it is not liable for their negligence.[31] Where the employer selects a competent physician to treat the employees, it may rely on the presumption that his competency will continue until notice of a change.[32] In order that the reputation of the physician may constitute constructive notice to the employer, it must be so general and notorious that ignorance shows the negligence of the employer,[33] and, where the reasons which are relied on to charge the employer with knowledge of the reputation of the physician apply with equal force to show knowledge on the part of the employee, his negligence in failing to make complaint is as great as is that of the employer in retaining the physician.[34]

Profit to employer. In order for the employer to escape liability for the negligence of the physician, it must appear that the employer did not derive any profit from the retention or selection of the physician.[35] Where deductions from the pay of the employee for the purpose of providing medical and hospital attention have resulted in direct pecuniary profit to the employer, it is responsible for the negligence or malpractice of physicians, although they have been employed after the exercise of due care,[36] and likewise it has been held that, where the employer contracts for a consideration to treat its employees for any injury received by them in its employ, it is liable for the malpractice of a physician or surgeon employed.[37]

Hospital maintained by employer. The employer or an organization formed by it which maintains a hospital for supplying medical attention to the employees is generally not liable for the negligence of physicians, surgeons, and attendants serving in the hospital where it has exercised ordinary care in selecting and retaining them.[38] The cases exempting the employer from liability are frequently placed on the theory that the maintenance of the hospital is a charity,[39] and this theory also has been applied to obviate liability on the part of the hospital association as such.[40] Obviously this theory is inapplicable where the employer operates the hospital for gain or profit, and in such case it is liable for the negligence of the physicians employed at the hospital,[41] and it has been indicated that a like rule would apply where the employer had contracted to supply medical service for a consideration.[42] It has been held that the hospital is operated for profit within this rule where deductions are made from the employees' wages for its maintenance[43] even though it does not appear whether the sums deducted from wages exceed the cost of maintaining the hospital.[44]

Other cases hold that, where a hospital is maintained by contributions deducted from the pay of the employees, the master is not liable because of the negligence of physicians, surgeons, and attendants serving in the hospital where it has exercised ordinary care in selecting and retaining them,[45] at least where the deductions from wages do not yield

Reduction in compensation payments
Fact that in many cases employer or his insurer is ultimately relieved from compensation payments in full or part through physician's services would not, in the ordinary or usual meaning of the word, be considered a profit within rule that employer must not derive a profit from physician's services in order to avoid liability for employee's death caused by physician's negligence, but physician's sharing compensation with employer, or employer's interest or ownership in hospital, would result in profit.—Ford v. the employer a profit over and above the expenses of maintaining the hospital;[46] the master being considered merely as a trustee for the proper administration and expenditure of the hospital fund.[47] In any event, there is no liability where negligence is not established.[48]

The reasonable diligence required of the master extends to the retention of physicians and other attendants,[49] and includes the duty to supervise the work of the hospital[50] and to discharge any appointees who, although reasonably competent at the time of their appointment have, because of the use of intoxicants or narcotics or for other causes, since become incompetent.[51]

Where the hospital is conducted by an association of employees and is under their management, although it is recognized and aided by the employer, the acts of the hospital in furnishing medical treatment to an injured employee at his volition cannot be regarded as the act of the master[52] or of his agent,[53] and this is true although persons other than members of the association are taken to the hospital by the master for treatment at the master's expense.[54]

Consideration; moral obligation

The moral obligation resting on an employer to furnish assistance and care to an injured employee, even though the employer was not responsible for the injury, constituted a sufficient consideration for the agreement of the employer's president to pay a physician for professional services rendered such servant.—Scott v. Monte Cristo Oil & Development Co., 115 P. 64, 15 Cal. App. 453.

Mistake

Employer, having employed dentist to treat injured employee, was held bound to pay therefor, although mistaken as to liability.—Capron v. Utica Ice Co., 217 N.Y.S. 732, 127 Misc. 848.

Revocation

(1) Railroad company was held not liable to doctor employed to attend a person struck by a train for services undertaken after notice that it would not be liable for further services or attention.—Vandalia R. Co. v. Bryan, 110 N.E. 218, 60 Ind. App. 223.

(2) The employment of plaintiff physicians by defendant to treat his injured employee continued while the case demanded their services or till they were discharged by defendant, so that he not having discharged them, but merely informed them, while treating the employee, that he would not pay them, as he had not employed them, he was liable for their further treatment of the employee up to the time he was in condition to be dismissed from further treatment.—Gray v. Lumpkin & Thomas, Tex.Civ.App., 159 S.W. 880, error refused.

Original undertaking

Master's promise to pay physician for medical attention to servant was held to make master liable for physician's services as on original undertaking, although sheriff procured physician to attend servant and promised to pay physician for his visit if no one else would agree to pay him.—Guy v. Riley, 180 S.E. 624, 51 Ga.App. 404.

Authority of physician to contract for hospital services

Where a physician called by the master took the injured employee to a hospital and informed the authorities that the master would pay the bill, the master was bound by such acts on the part of his agent.—Omaha General Hospital v. Strehlow, 147 N.W. 846, 96 Neb. 308.

Services covered by contract

(1) Contract written by railroad providing for doctor's services will be strictly construed against it; doctor's contract to render free medical attention to patrons and employees of railroad was held not to include surgical attention.—Missouri & N. A. R. Co. v. Fowler, 293 S.W. 47, 173 Ark. 772.

(2) A physician employed by a department store to render services to an injured employee could not recover for consultations with physicians, appointed by the court, in an action by the injured employee against the store, with a view of giving evidence in that action.—Ghio mere fact that an employer summoned the physician or requested the performance of medical services does not necessarily establish a contract to pay[56] although such facts may, in the light of the particular circumstances, imply a binding promise to pay.[57]

Independent of contract, a physician ordinarily may not recover from an employer for services rendered an employee.[58] The employer is not liable for medical attendance even where the employee was injured in the course of his employment so as to make the employer liable for the injuries.[59]

The fact that the employer collected a fund out of the wages of its employees for medical aid does not necessarily make the employer liable to a physician for services rendered an employee.[60] Where a fund has been collected by the employer for the payment of a mine physician, one who holds an order of the employee authorizing a deduction from his wages for the payment of the holder as physician, which order is unaccepted by the employer, cannot attack the validity of the choice of another physician as the mine physician or attack his right to the fund.[61] Under a statute which provides that the entire amount deducted from the pay of the employees for the purpose of payment of a physician must be paid over to him, a physician cannot recover from the employer a balance alleged to have been withheld in the absence of a showing that there is a specified fund in the hands of defendant, withheld from the employees and laborers for the avowed purpose of paying his salary as company physician,[62] and it is not sufficient to show that there was a general understanding among the employees and laborers as to the purpose for which the fund is withheld.[63]

§ 167. Relief and Benefit Departments or Associations

The rules relating to plans, funds, or departments established and maintained by the employer either unilaterally or under contract with the employees, or associations of employees encouraged and aided by the employer, for the relief and benefit of employees or beneficiaries designated by them, are discussed infra §§ 168–170. Social security, unemployment compensation, and like matters made compulsory by statute are discussed in the C.J.S. title Social Security and Public Welfare.

a. In General

When not prohibited by charter or statute, an employer may maintain an insurance plan for the protection of its employees, form a relief department and guarantee payment of its obligations, or ad pt a pension plan where payments to be made thereunder bear a reasonable relation to the value of services rendered and to be rendered.

For the purpose of providing for relief or the payment of benefits in the case of accident, sickness, or death of their employees, various employers, particularly railroads, have from time to time organized or encouraged the formation among their employees of what are commonly known as relief departments or funds.[64] Such relief departments or associations are not insurance companies in such a sense as to bring them within the operation of statutes relating to such companies, as discussed in Insurance § 59, but they are more properly regarded as beneficial societies.[65]

Notice unauthorized

A notice posted by a railroad yardmaster directing employees in case of accident not to call a particular physician was held not to have been authorized by an employees' beneficial association.—Peek v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 152 P. 421, 51 Mont. 295, L.R.A.1916B 835.

A corporation employer, although not an insurance company, may maintain an insurance plan for the protection of its employees engaged in the conduct of the business of the corporations where it is not contrary to the express terms of incorporation.[66] So the formation by a railroad company of a relief department together with a guaranty of the payment of its obligations will not be held ultra vires,[67] at least in the absence of evidence of the terms of the charter of the corporation.[68] An employee cannot assert that the maintenance of a relief department is ultra vires after having received the benefits secured to him by his contract,[69] and one who deals with it as a legal entity capable of transacting business, and in consequence receives from it money or other thing of value, is estopped to deny the legality of its existence or its right to contract.[70] The admission and treatment of nonmember patients at the hospital of a railroad employees' relief association is not ultra vires where there is nothing in the certificate, constitution, or by-laws which provides that the hospital shall be for the exclusive use of the members of the association or which prohibits the admission of nonmembers.[71]

Corporate pension plans provide a legitimate method of granting employees deferred compensation in addition to basic salaries where the payments to be made thereunder bear a reasonable relation to the value of services rendered and to be rendered and hence are not objectionable as a gift which majority stockholders have no right to make over the protest of a minority.[72] The validity of a statute prohibiting any corporation from directly or indirectly compelling or requiring an employee to join any company or association whatsoever, and from withholding any part of an employee's wages or salary for the payment of dues or assessments in any society or organization, has been upheld.[73] While a statute forbidding a corporation to compel an employee to contribute to a benefit or insurance fund maintained or managed for the employees by the corporation or by any other corporation or person is constitutional,[74] it does not forbid all compulsory contributions to benefit or insurance funds, but only those where the fund is maintained or managed for the employees by some one other than themselves.[75] A statute providing that an employee of a company which has established a pension system shall, after having served at least one fourth of the term required to qualify him for a pension, be qualified to receive a proportionate part of the pension has been held invalid.[76]

b. Membership

By-laws or other regulations of an employees' relief association are controlling in respect of eligibility for membership and termination of membership. False warranties as to a material matter in an application for membership may deprive the member of the right to benefits.

The eligibility of particular persons to membership in an employees' relief association must be determined by the by-laws or other regulations of the association.[77] In the case of an incorporated association, the organization cannot be required by estoppel to pay benefits to a member who is not eligible under the terms of its charter.[78] Where a relief department, however, with knowledge that no formal application has been made and no examination had, deducts assessments from the pay of the employee on the basis of membership and retains them, it is estopped to deny his membership;[79] but a mere deduction of assessments by the employer is ineffective to show an acceptance of the employee's application in the absence of authorization or ratification by the relief association.[80]

False warranties as to a material matter by the member in his application will deprive him of the right to benefits[81] although it has been held that it must be shown that the vitiating statements were knowingly false or made with a fraudulent purpose to mislead the company.[82]

Termination of membership. The termination of the employment will terminate the employee's rights under a benefit certificate[83] or his membership in a relief association where its regulations so provide;[84] and, at least in respect of the right of a beneficiary to a death benefit,[85] or even in respect of sick benefits,[86] this may be true although the employment ceased because of sickness or disability. However, it has been held that the failure of the association to exercise its right to terminate the membership because of termination of employment is a waiver thereof in so far as a beneficiary is concerned and the latter's rights, after the death of the member, are the same as though employment had not been terminated.[87] A mere absence from duty not in itself terminating the employment will not terminate the membership;[88] but sometimes, under a rule of the employer issuing the certificate, the certificate is automatically canceled after a prescribed period of absence.[89] Where the employment is terminated, a retention by mistake of an assessment from the employee's pay will not continue his membership.[90]

Failure to pay assessments in advance as required by the regulations may terminate the membership,[91] and an assessment insufficient in amount to cover the next ensuing period cannot be apportioned to the first part thereof.[92]

c. Dissolution and Winding Up

On dissolution of an employees' relief society, or on discontinuance of a benefit plan where no association or organization has been formed, the funds on hand are regarded as held on a resulting trust and are to be distributed to the contributors in proportion to their contributions.

In the absence of a statutory provision therefor, a dissolution of a voluntary relief organization cannot be had in equity unless some parties representing each of the conflicting interests are before the court.[93] On dissolution of a voluntary relief society, its funds are held by the trustees for the benefit of the contributors and donors as a resulting trust,[94] and likewise, where a fund is established by contributions of the employer and of the employees from which benefits are paid to the employees, but there is no organization or association formed, the fund is held as a trust fund,[95] of which the employer is a trustee,[96] and on discontinuance of the plan the fund is distributed, not in accordance with the rules governing the distribution of the property of a voluntary association, but as a resulting trust to all who contributed to it in proportion to their contributions.[97] In case of a voluntary discontinuance of the plan, the rights of the parties are determined as of the date of discontinuance.[98] An employees' pension fund committee may not be held personally liable for distributing the fund, on dissolution, in accordance with a plain and unambiguous rule.[99] Provisions in the by-laws for the discontinuance of the association may be waived or set aside by the members.[1]

Division and partial distribution of assets without dissolution. Where the employer is still in business and employing the larger part of the membership of an employees' benefit association, members who lost employment en masse because of the closing of one of the employer's mills have been held not entitled to a decree dissolving the association and distributing its assets as on a dissolution,[2] but they have been held entitled to a decree for division of the net assets of the association between the association, for the benefit of the members continuing to be employees, and the members who were discharged en masse, and for a distribution of their proportionate shares to the employees who were so discharged.[3]

d. Refund or Recovery Back of Contributions or Deductions from Wages

An employee who has contributed is not entitled to recover back the amount of such contributions except where the relief plan is unlawful or except to the extent provided by the plan or by regulations of a relief department.

Where, by statute, a relief plan under which the employee directly or indirectly agrees to surrender or waive any right of action against the employer for damages from personal injuries is void, as discussed infra § 170, it has been held or recognized that an action will lie by the employee to recover the amount deducted from his wages during his service for the benefit of the relief fund,[4] but ordinarily, where the employee has consented to a deduction from his wages by receipting therefor in full, he cannot recover in an action at law any part of the fund created except in accordance with the terms of the plan;[5] and an employee who has refused to permit continuance of deductions from his salary and who is not qualified for benefits is not entitled to repayment of the sum previously paid into the fund on his behalf.[6]

A fund committee will not be held to have misdistributed the fund by permitting the withdrawal of contributions by discharged employees in accordance with the rules;[7] and a return of the money so withdrawn will not be decreed in a proceeding to which the discharged employees making the withdrawals are not parties.[8] However, the provisions of some plans, and the regulations of some relief departments, relative to a return or refund on termination of employment have been construed to refer only to a refund of the unearned portion of the last month's contribution, and not to entitle an employee leaving the service to a return or refund of all the contributions made by him, less the amount, if any, received

(1) Members of employees' benefit association who lost their employment by closing of one of employer's mills were not precluded from asserting rights in assets of association by fact that employees of another mill previously closed had asserted no such rights.—Longhine v. Bilson, supra.

(2) Also such members were entitled to share in assets of association, notwithstanding by-law providing for cessation of membership and forfeiture of all rights to benefits or to moneys paid to association when member voluntarily or involuntarily left employ of employer, since by-law was intended simply to cover case of individual members who left employ of employer, not mass discharge of employees by closing of mill.—Longhine v. § 169. —— Benefits

a. In general
b. Beneficiaries
c. Remedies and procedure within organization
d. Execution of releases
e. Actions for benefits

a. In General

The employee or beneficiary is entitled to benefits only as provided for by the accepted plan or other contract and rules and regulations embraced within the contract.

A benefit plan offered by an employer to all its employees and impliedly accepted by them through remaining in the employment constitutes a contract between the employer and employee,[11] the service rendered by the employee being a sufficient consideration to support the employer's promise to pay benefits.[12] In such case the plan is not a mere gratuity or charity conferring on the employees and their dependents no legal rights,[13] and payments of benefits under the plan are not mere gratuities to be awarded in the discretion of the corporate employer's officials.[14] However, a mere proposal on the part of the employer to pay benefits under certain specified conditions does not become a contract until the terms are accepted and complied with by the employee.[15] Where there is an association, the contract, as far as it relates to benefits, consists in the application of membership, the policy or membership certificate,[16] and the regulations of the association.[17] So too, where there is a relief department, the contract may consist of the application, certificate, and regulations.[18]

The employee or beneficiary is entitled to benefits only as provided for by the accepted plan or other contract and rules or regulations embraced within the contract,[19] this rule being applicable to a

Office workers of coördinated railroads
The arrangement between two railroads for joint use of two short distances of track was not a "coordination" within agreement between railroads and employees providing for benefits to employees affected by a coördination, so as to entitle certain office workers of the railroads whose positions had been abolished to benefits under agreement, where it appeared that arrangement did not have slightest effect on number of office workers contingency on which benefits are[20] or are not[21] payable, and as to the amount of payments.[22] The foregoing is especially true where the fund is contributed entirely by the employer and is administered at his expense, the employer having the right in such case to reserve to himself the manner in which the plan shall be administered,[23] and the terms of the plan,[24] together with any rule which the employer makes regarding disposition of the fund[25] or carrying out of the plan,[26] are binding on, and determinative of the rights of, an employee, or beneficiary asserting rights to benefits.

The law of the state in which an application was made and accepted and in which a policy or certificate was executed and delivered governs the rights of the parties under the contract[27] even though a bill of interpleader is filed in another state by the employer's relief department.[28]

The right to unemployment compensation benefits is discussed in the C.J.S. title Social Security and Public Welfare.

Construction of provisions for benefits generally. The general rule that an insurance policy is to be construed strictly against the insurer, discussed in Insurance § 297 c, is applicable to an employee's insurance certificate issued by his employer.[29] Likewise, the terms of a plan, when formulated by the employer, are to be taken most strongly against him.[30] A certificate, issued by a corporate employer to its employee, should be liberally construed in or-needed to handle business of railroads.—Fort Worth & Rio Grande Ry. Co. v. Evans, Tex.Civ.App., 150 S.W.2d 408, error dismissed, judgment correct.

Failure to collect premium

Under employes' benefit association's accident insurance policy, providing for payment of weekly premiums by employer's deduction of amounts thereof from insured employes' wages after expiration of each week, one employed by such employer for definite period and not discharged or laid off within week during which she was forced to quit because of accidental injury sustained while at work could recover weekly disability benefits, even though employer failed to collect premium for such week and deduct amount thereof from such employee's money in employer's hands. —Swift & Co. Taking advantage of old age pension law

Where railroad employees' benefit association provided for payment of benefits on dismissal from service, but that no member who had taken advantage of any old age pension law should be eligible therefor, and that indefinite leave of absence on account of permanent disability should be deemed a dismissal provided member had not attained retirement age under old age retirement law, employee who was past sixty-four when he was granted an indefinite leave of absence because of permanent disability and who thereafter received benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act, was not entitled to dismissal benefits, since employee had taken advantage of an old age pension law.—Bonner v. Railway Emp. Mut. Ass'n, Mont., 170 P.2d 400.

Discharge for fault of employee

Where service annuity contract provided for payment of annuity should employee before retirement be discharged for any reason not the fault of employee, and defined fault of employee as embracing any one of three enumerated causes, only discharge for one of such enumerated causes would relieve employer from liability for annuity; but absence of employee who when discharged had served one day of one year sentence in house of correction was within an enumerated cause of "continuous absence from duty without leave when not caused by illness or other similar disability," even though employee when sentenced was already absent due to a broken leg and would have continued absent for longer period than term of his sentence.—Marcus v. der that the purpose of issuing it may be realized;[31] an employer's benefit plan for employees must be read as a whole;[32] and the by-laws, if any, and regulations governing the creation and administration of the fund will be given the construction placed thereon by those on whom rests the responsibility of administering the fund unless such construction conflicts with law and public policy.[33]

Pensions and retirement benefits. A pension is a stated allowance or stipend made in consideration of past services, or of the surrender of rights or emoluments, to one retired from service.[34] It involves the fundamental idea of compensation for services rendered, the payment of which is deferred until after completion of the services in order to induce long-continued and faithful service.[35] Except as created and provided for by contract or statute, the policy of promoting and assuring financial protection of deserving employees in their old age does not legally enter into the relationship of employer and employee.[36] Where a retirement plan is not included in a contract between employer and employee, the benefits described therein are entirely voluntary and gratuitous on the part of the employer;[37] and the employer may condition his bounty as he sees fit.[38] Services rendered in the past,[39] or appreciation thereof,[40] or a moral consideration,[41] or a requirement that employees report at the office for the purpose of receiving their checks[42] is not a sufficient consideration for a contract to pay employees pensions; and, where an arrangement under which pensions are paid is not supported by a valid consideration, it is revocable at the pleasure of the employer.[43]

On the other hand, where a retirement plan is not a mere benefaction, but is a contract supported by a consideration moving from the employee, the employer may not arbitrarily refuse payment of benefits thereunder.[44] Such a contract arises where, although the original offer of additional compensation, by way of a pension, for services to be rendered was voluntary and gratuitous, the services have been rendered and a pension has been awarded;[45] but even where there is a contract the offer

Consideration
(1) Agreement by former employer, on employee's retirement, to pay stipulated pension, conditioned on employee remaining loyal and not engaging in competitive employment, was supported by sufficient consideration.—Langer v. Superior Steel Corporation, 161 A. 571, 105 Pa.Super. 579.

(2) Benefit to employer is valid consideration for contribution to employees' pension fund.—Cowles v. Morris & Co., 161 N.E. 150, 330 Ill. 11.

Promissory estoppel
(1) Employer's agreement to pay stipulated pension to employee on retirement conditioned on employee remaining loyal and not engaging in competitive employment is enforceable by employee under principle of promissory estoppel.—Langer v. Superior Steel Corporation, 161 A. 571, 105 Pa.Super. 579.

(2) Where evidence showed that employee, although ill, would have continued in employment for six more years, thereby becoming entitled to a pension under a pension plan effective as to employees employed by employer continuously for twenty years prior to attaining sixty years of age but for employee's reliance on employer's oral promise that if employee retired he would not jeopardize his right to qualify for a pension, under doctrine of promissory estoppel the employer would have been barred at expiration of six-year period from claiming that employee was not entitled to pension, notwithstanding oral agreement was within statute of frauds, if pension plan had remained in effect.—Sessions v. Southern California Edison Co., 118 P.2d 935, 47 Cal.App.2d 611.

When the conditions are satisfied, retirement pay becomes a vested right of which the person entitled thereto cannot be deprived.—David v. Veitscher Magnesitwerke Actien is accepted subject to the express conditions thereof,[46] and an employee is not entitled to a pension until he is qualified therefor according to the conditions imposed.[47]

The amount of a pension is determinable by applying the pertinent provisions of the plan.[48] A person receiving benefits has no enforceable right to different or greater benefits than those awarded him where, under the plan, the award is wholly within the discretion of the trustees,[49] nor, in the absence of a contractual obligation to do so, is the employer required to enlarge the pension payments of all pensioners in a class because it does so gratuitously, and out of its own corporate funds, for some one or more of that class.[50]

Employment contracts containing provisions for retirement pay are liberally construed to effectuate the declared intention of the parties to pay additional compensation for services rendered in the past;[51] and, where the inducement of a pension was accepted by an employee, booklets in which the employer explained the pension system will be construed most strongly against the employer;[52] but it has been held that the contract possesses none of the elements of a contract of insurance and is not to be strictly interpreted against the employer, especially where the burden it assumed was entirely voluntary and gratuitous.[53] A provision of a retirement

Subsequent matter not nullifying contract

A contract for pension payments to employee, following due award, during balance of his life, subject to cancellation only for gross misconduct, was not nullified by commitment of former employee to state insane hospital, notwithstanding employer contributed substantially to such institution through taxation.—Texas & N. Inchoate right

Right of employee to pension or retirement pay is inchoate until happening of contingency on which it was to be allowed.

Resolution of board of directors

A retired, pensioned employee whose name was omitted from list of pensioners entitled to receive increased pension payments under resolution of employer's board of directors providing for increased pensions for employees who would have been entitled to higher pensions if an abolished pension plan had been in effect on their retirement, could not maintain an action against employer to compel payments to be made to employee on the higher basis; and, in so holding, the court considered itself bound to read the resolution as a whole and give particular effect to specific language bearing on employee's claim rather than general language.—Sessions v. Southern California Edison Co., supra.

An arbitrator's award which was basis of employment contract between unions and employers, and which provided that employers should provide for payment of pensions to employees during their lives, required employers to provide pension payments for life of all employees becoming entitled thereto during employment contract period, and not merely pension payments to eligible employees during period of contract.—New York City Omnibus Corp. v. Quill, 73 N.Y.S.2d 289.

Words used by employer in booklets explaining its pension system that employees would receive benefits of system "when old age overtakes you," did not require an exhibition of senile decreptitude before pension became payable; and where employee continued in employment for twenty-seven years, relying on booklets, he was entitled to receive pension when discharged at age of fifty-two, because employer had no further employment to which he was suited.—Sigman v. Rudolph Wurlitzer Co., supra.

plan that no pension shall be paid out of capital assets of the employer will be accorded effect where the employer earns no profit;[54] and the term "profits" will be deemed to refer to net income computed by including within the items properly deductible from current receipts a fair allowance for depreciation of capital assets.[55]

b. Beneficiaries

The right of an employee to name or change a beneficiary in a death benefit certificate issued to him is qualified only by such restrictions, if any, as are imposed by statute or regulations of the department or association.

The employee may name any person whom he pleases as his beneficiary except as restricted by statute or by regulations of the association,[56] and only the association can question the eligibility of the beneficiary named by him.[57] The beneficiary named by the employee need not have an insurable interest in the life of the employee.[58] A person may have no legal right to payment of a death benefit where he was not designated beneficiary by the employee[59] or where, under the employer's regulations, any designation by the employee would be only a request, final decision as to whom payment would be made resting with a committee;[60] but, where the employer has exercised its discretion as to whom payment shall be made by paying part of the sum due, it is obligated to pay the remainder to the same person.[61]

Widow or divorced wife. Where, under the rules of the association, if no beneficiary is designated in the application benefits are payable to the wife of the employee, the widow of the employee may sue as beneficiary although no application was filed by the member.[62] Under some policies, certificates, or regulations, a divorced wife, although originally named beneficiary, is not entitled to benefits;[63] and, although divorce may not have terminated a wife's right as beneficiary under the rules of the association,[64] her rights may have been terminated by a comprehensive property settlement.[65] Under a benefit plan, it may be necessary and sufficient, in order to entitle the widow of an employee to benefits, that she should have been living with the employee[66] or dependent on him for support to at least a certain prescribed per cent of his pay[67] at the time of his death; but under other plans the relationship of husband and wife is all that is essential and the extent to which the employee was contributing to the support of his wife is immaterial.[68]

Change of beneficiary. The beneficiary in a death benefit certificate has no vested interest therein during the employee's lifetime, but only an expectancy contingent on his death and subject to a change of beneficiary.[69] In the absence of a rule of the department to the contrary, the employee has an unqualified right to change the beneficiary.[70] Con-

Lack of estoppel

Corporation was not estopped to deny that item "reserve for pensions and benefits" did not constitute trust fund for employee's pension under retirement plan, notwithstanding it entered in such account various types of fines and commissions on insurance policies issued to employees, where corporation had paid out more for pensions than fund amounted to and employee did not lose benefit of insurance taken out by him under corporation's endowment pension plan antedating the present pension plan.—Gearns v. sent of the beneficiary first named is unnecessary;[71] but, where the by-laws or regulations require the written consent of the superintendent of the department, such act of the superintendent is discretionary, rather than ministerial,[72] and it may not be performed,[73] nor may performance thereof be waived by the insurer,[74] after the death of insured, and insured's written statement requesting, or purporting to make, a change of beneficiary is not alone sufficient to effect the change.[75]

In the absence of special circumstances, the former beneficiary has no standing to contest the employee's change of beneficiary.[76] While this rule does not apply if the employee agreed for a consideration to name, or not to change, a beneficiary,[77] or if he became irrevocably obligated by promissory estoppel not to make a change,[78] it does apply where it does not appear that there was any consideration for, or action or forbearance to act in reliance on, the employee's promise not to change the beneficiary.[79] Under the terms of some certificates and by-laws, only the insurer can, after the death of insured, contest a change of beneficiary made by insured and approved by the proper officer of insurer.[80]

A specific provision that marriage of a member shall immediately substitute the wife in place of the designated beneficiary has been regarded as clear and unambiguous and requiring no construction.[81] It is controlling in a situation within its terms, notwithstanding the marriage is secret[82] and although general regulations require payment of benefits to the beneficiary designated in the application and consent of the superintendent of the department to a change of beneficiary.[83]

c. Remedies and Procedure within Organization

Unless there are circumstances excusing a failure to do so, remedies before a board or committee provided for by the plan or regulations must be exhausted before resort may be had to the courts.

The regulations of relief fund organizations usually provide a method for the determination of questions arising as to the administration of the fund and the right to benefits by a particular officer or committee and frequently provide for an appeal to a higher tribunal from the decision, and such a procedure, when established, must be followed before resort may be had to the courts[84] unless circumstances exist which excuse a failure to do so.[85] As to whether a provision that the determination of the organization shall be conclusive precludes a resort to the courts, there is, in analogy to the rule applicable to beneficial associations generally, discussed in Beneficial Associations § 69, some difference of opinion. According to one view the member or his beneficiary cannot be precluded by such a regulation

Futility
The rule that members must comply with remedies within organization before suing for benefits is not applicable where compliance would be futile, illusory, and vain; but the rule of nonapplicability may not be invoked by a member who was responsible for fact that compliance with department's regulation requiring member to appeal from denial of benefits to department's board of adjustment within thirty days would be futile.—Jaroszewski v. Pennsylvania R. Co., supra.
Lack of hearing
(1) It is no defense to suit to recover benefits that claimant has not exhausted his remedy within system by seeking rehearing if claimant was never allowed first hearing, his case being arbitrarily disposed of, and if there are no rules of procedure for establishment of claims.—Jensen v. Bell Telephone Co. of Pennsylvania, 29 Pa.Dist. & Co. 476.
(2) A rule requiring an appeal from the determination of the superintendent to the advisory committee does not apply where there is no hearing before the superintendent, but his asserted determination rests merely in the writing of a letter denying the membership of the employee.—Burlington Voluntary Relief Dept. v. White, 59 N.W. 747, 41 Neb. 547, 43 Am.S.R. 701, followed in 59 N.W. 751, 41 Neb. 561.

from a resort to the courts for determination of the ultimate question as to whether he is entitled to benefits,[86] although it is held or recognized as to certain preliminary questions of fact that the determination of the organization may be conclusive.[87] According to another view, where membership of the organization is purely voluntary, the member is regarded as having submitted to the decision of its tribunals[88] and is bound by them in the absence of fraud or mistake,[89] and this is particularly true where the committee whose decision is made final is selected in part by the employer and in part by the contributing employees.[90]

Where the fund is maintained by the employer, the employee making no contribution thereto, it is peculiarly within the power of the employer establishing the plan to make the determination of a board or committee conclusive.[91] In order that such a provision may be accorded effect, it is necessary and sufficient that the investigation and action of the board or committee be full,[92] fair,[93] and reasonable,[94] and not arbitrary,[95] capricious,[96] or in bad faith.[97] Although under the plan the obligation of the company is limited to making payments from the fund on the order of the committee, the failure of the committee to act on plaintiff's claim does not bar an action for benefits.[98] The employer waives his rights to have the facts decided by a committee under a benefit plan by an answer in an action for benefits that the facts are as stated in the complaint.[99]

A provision in the plan that a decision of a board shall be conclusive on both questions of fact and questions of law is valid;[1] but, where the plan provides that questions of fact arising in administration of the regulations shall be determined conclusively for all parties by a committee, the inference is that the committee has no authority to bind either the employer or the employee by any decision on a question of law.[2]

d. Execution of Releases

Provisions in a benefit plan relative to the execution of releases as a condition to the payment of benefits have been accorded effect.

The execution of releases as specified by the plan may be made a condition to the payment of benefits,[3] but releases other than as specified cannot be required,[4] and it has been held that a requirement of a release from all persons interested as a condition to the payment of death benefits to the beneficiary named is invalid in that it may be impossible of performance.[5] Such a requirement, on the other hand, has been held valid,[6] and a release by the person entitled to bring an action for death, executed to enable the beneficiary to obtain payments of death benefits, has been sustained.[7]

A formal release, although provided for, has been held not necessary where there is an acceptance of benefits; such acceptance is the substance of the release.[8]

e. Actions for Benefits

Where there has been a compliance with valid conditions precedent, or such compliance has been excused, an employee or beneficiary may bring an action and, on proper and sufficient allegations and proof, recover the benefits to which he is entitled and which have been withheld.

In order to sustain an action for the recovery of benefits there must be a compliance with the valid conditions precedent imposed by the regulations or the plan[9] or such compliance must have been excused.[10] An action for money had and received cannot be maintained in the absence of a showing of facts supporting such an action generally.[11] Only the person named as the beneficiary may sue to recover death benefits.[12] The trustees of the fund on whose order payment is to be made should be joined with the employer where the employer is a mere custodian of the fund.[13]

Pleadings; issues, proof, and variance. Except as excused from doing so by defendant's pleadings,[14] plaintiff must plead performance of conditions precedent or an excuse for nonperformance.[15] An allegation that defendant's representation influenced plaintiff to continue in defendant's employment may be considered as pleading a sufficient consideration for defendant's promise to pay benefits;[16] but, where the employment and insurance provisions of a contract are severable, it is not necessary, in a suit on the insurance provisions, to allege performance of the required services.[17] An amendment of the petition may be allowed where it seeks recovery of benefits up to the time of trial and disability continues that long,[18] but not, after trial, for the purpose of presenting, and obtaining a trial of, a new

Lack of prejudice

Discharged employee was not precluded from recovering from benefit fund amount equal to death benefit, even if by-laws required certificate of physician designated by fund, where demand for benefits was refused on ground of discharge, fund's physician agreed with employee's personal physician as to disability, employee was discharged because of permanent physical disability, and it was not shown that fund's rights were prejudiced by failure to furnish certificate.—Lloyd v. Wilson Employee's Mut. Ben. Fund, 65 P.2d 314, 145 Kan. 441.

Defendant's assertions before suit

Where beneficial association asserted before institution of employee's suit to recover further sick benefits that employee was no longer incapacitated and was cured and that he voluntarily terminated his employment and thus also his association membership, association was limited to those defenses and could not urge in support of its refusal to pay benefits after attempted discharge of employee that employee failed to perform one of the conditions of his contract of employment.—Kahn v. Absence of plea of prematurity

A petition which alleged an ineffectual demand by widow on deceased husband's former employer for payment of gratuitous death benefits was sufficient notwithstanding failure to allege that committee in whose power administration of benefit plan was placed had acted in bad faith or was guilty of fraud, in absence of plea of prematurity in failing to exhaust remedy before committee.—Robinson v. issue rather than for the purpose of conforming the pleading to the evidence.[19] Exclusion of plaintiff widow as a beneficiary by the employee prior to his death is a matter of defense to be alleged by defendant.[20] Evidence admissible under the pleadings may be received,[21] and, where plaintiff seeks to recover on the ground of manifest mistake on the part of the organization's tribunal in denying the claim, he is required to present to the jury all the evidence that was before such tribunal.[22]

In a controversy between beneficiaries, a bill of interpleader is not a waiver of defects in the claim of one beneficiary;[23] and, in an action by the personal representative of a deceased member, the failure of defendant association to pay the money into court and seek an interpleader issue between plaintiff and the beneficiary named in the application for membership does not cause the association to lose any of its legal rights.[24]

Evidence. Plaintiff has the burden of establishing facts entitling him to recover.[25] The evidence admissible extends[26] and is limited[27] to that which is competent and has a material tendency to prove or disprove a matter in issue. General rules ordinarily apply with respect to the weight and sufficiency of the evidence.[28]

Allegations not requiring reply

Evidence that committee empowered to administer benefit system abused its discretion and showed general want of good faith in passing on particular claim may be introduced in suit to enforce claim even though not pleaded by plaintiff if defendant set up action of committee as defense, but did not plead it as new matter so that plaintiff was required to answer it.—Jensen v. Qualification of plaintiff as beneficiary

In action by widow against employer for payments under plan providing for continuance of payment after employee's death to his widow if living with or dependent on employee at time of his death, widow had burden of showing either that she was living with the deceased at time of his death or that she was dependent on him for support.—Robinson v. Plaintiff's lack of membership

Evidence to show that plaintiff was never accepted as, or became, a member of defendant association, including, as a link in a chain, the testimony of defendant's medical examiner that plaintiff was never examined by him, as required by the rules, is admissible.—Baltimore & O. Mortality tables are not admissible as evidence where the recovery is sought merely for weekly benefits because of disability.—Baltimore & Ohio Employees' Relief Ass'n v. Post, supra.

Receipts

The rules and regulations of the association cannot be established by receipts by plaintiff of benefits as a former member.—Baltimore & Ohio Employees' Relief Ass'n v. Post, supra.

Uncommunicated intention

In action by administratrix of deceased employee against association to recover balance of savings account due employee, trial court properly rejected administatrix' offers to prove an intention on employee's part to send in his deposit book and withdraw balance of savings account, in accordance with association's regulation, where offers contained no offer to prove that intention had been communicated to the association, or that demand had ever been made by employee in his lifetime for balance due.—Ebersole v. Pennsylvania Railroad Employes Provident & Loan Ass'n, 23 A.2d 238, 147 Pa.Super. 5.

Trial and judgment. Questions of law are to be determined by the court,[29] as are also questions of fact where the trial is before the court alone;[30] but, where the trial is before a jury, questions of fact are to be submitted to them[31] under proper instructions,[32] provided the evidence is sufficient for that purpose.[33]

The recovery is the amount provided by the charter and by-laws of the association, and not such an amount as the jury may approve as just.[34] Interest on unpaid pension installments may be included in the judgment;[35] but, under the pleadings, benefits accruing after the commencement of the action may not be recoverable.[36] When incidental to primary relief prayed for, an order recognizing an employee's status as a member may not be objectionable.[37]

§ 170. —— Election between Benefits and Actions for Injuries or Death

a. In general
b. Effect of acceptance of benefits
c. Effect of action for injury
d. Constitutional and statutory provisions

a. In General

In the absence of constitutional or statutory prohibition, a provision that an employee's acceptance of benefits under the plan shall constitute a bar to an action for injuries to, or death of, the employee, and, conversely, that the maintenance of an action for the injury or death against the employer shall operate as a bar to a claim for benefits, has been held valid.

When not prohibited by constitution or statute, a provision in an employees' relief plan that an employee's acceptance of benefits under the plan shall constitute a bar to an action for injuries to, or death of, the employee, and, conversely, that the maintenance of an action for the injury or death against the employer shall operate as a bar to a claim for benefits, has ordinarily been regarded as not against public policy,[38] although there is also authority to the contrary.[39] The cases sustaining such a regulation proceed on the theory that it is not a contract to release the master from liability for future negligence, but is an agreement to elect between the benefits provided by the plan and the pursuit of such remedy as the employee may have against the employer, and that it is the acceptance of the benefits after the accident and not entering into the contract which constitutes the release.[40] An agreement that in case of acceptance of benefits the employer shall be released from liability is not void as an agreement to furnish insurance.[41]

Consideration for agreement to elect. Where the employer contributes to the relief fund and assumes a liability for its administration and for any deficit in the amount necessary to pay benefits, there is a consideration on its part which will support the contract of the employee,[42] and the contract is not void for want of mutuality.[43] On the other hand, it has been held that, where the amounts paid by the members are manifestly intended to cover the cost of insurance and a deficiency is a contingency which is not likely to happen, the fact that the employer agrees to supply any deficiency will not permit him to assert that the acceptance of benefits by the member shall operate as a release and satisfaction of claims for damages under a stipulation in the contract of membership,[44] and in consonance with this view it has been held that the mere guaranty of the employer to fulfill the obligations of the department, and his agreement to pay its operating expenses and supply the necessary facilities for the conduct of its business, do not in themselves establish a consideration for a release executed by the employee in the absence of a showing that the employee has received something for which he has not paid by his own contributions.[45]

A promise for the benefit of the employer, although made to the relief department, may be availed of by the employer.[46]

What law governs. Where under the law of the forum and of the place of the accident a contract by which the acceptance of benefits in an employer's relief department is invalid as a defense to an action by the employee for injury, a contract entered into by the employee in another state and the acceptance of the benefits provided thereunder in such state will not operate as a bar, although recognized as such in the sister state.[47] A release by acceptance of benefits under a relief department contract, the validity of which is recognized in the state wherein it is made and in which the accident occurred, will be recognized in a state wherein the action is brought.[48] A statute of the forum governs where the contract for benefits was intended by the parties to be executed in the state, although it was entered into in another state.[49] Although an application for membership in a relief department is accepted outside of the state, if the contract of employment is to be performed within the state it has been held that it is to be governed by the law thereof.[50]

b. Effect of Acceptance of Benefits

An injured employee who has accepted relief benefits in pursuance of an agreement to elect between such benefits and an action for damages, or has executed a release in consideration of benefits received, may not sue the employer for damages resulting from the injury except where the acceptance of benefits was procured by fraud or undue influence or was made in reliance on a promise which has not been fulfilled, in which case he must return, or offer to return, the benefit received before seeking to avoid the effect of the acceptance.

Where the employee has agreed that in case of injury he will elect between a taking of the benefits provided by the relief plan and his action against the employer, he cannot, after the acceptance of benefits, maintain an action against the employer,[51] even though he has been mistaken as to his rights,[52] unless the acceptance of the benefits has been procured by fraud or undue influence[53] or induced by a promise which has not been fulfilled.[54] In such case the inadequacy of the consideration received will not be considered.[55] The fact that an employee has been advised by his superintendent or foreman to join the relief department does not establish coercion, although the superintendent had the power to discharge him.[56] Without regard to the validity of the relief contract, an employee who executes releases in consideration of benefits received from the relief association cannot thereafter assert the liability of the employer.[57]

Return of benefits. Where the election to accept benefits is induced by fraud or undue influence, the employee seeking to avoid its effects should return or offer to return benefits received,[58] and if they are not returned they may be allowed in reduction of damages.[59] In case the employee accepts benefits under a mistake as to the permanent character of his injuries, he cannot avoid the effect of such acceptance without an effort to return the benefits after ascertaining the mistake.[60]

Necessity of full performance. According to some authorities a payment of a part of the benefits to which the employee is entitled will not prevent the prosecution of an action for damages in the absence of an express stipulation that the acceptance of a part shall have such effect,[61] and the master is not in a position to plead a relief fund agreement in bar of the action unless there has been a compliance with such contract on his part.[62] However, according to other authorities the acceptance of any benefit is sufficient to establish an election,[63] and thereafter the remedy of the beneficiary is confined to the enforcement of the relief department contract.[64]

c. Effect of Action for Injury

A valid contract requiring an election between the acceptance of benefits from a relief fund and an action against the employer for the same injury precludes the recovery of benefits after the recovery of damages, or after the institution of an action for damages, unless there is a voluntary nonsuit or discontinuance or a dismissal without prejudice.

Where there is a valid contract requiring an election between the acceptance of benefits from a relief fund and an action against the employer for the injury, the recovery of damages for an injury bars the recovery of benefits for the same injury,[65] and an action to recover benefits cannot be brought after an action for damages has been instituted without compliance with the conditions of the relief plan as to discontinuance thereof.[66] The widow after bringing an action as administratrix for the wrongful death of the employee which is prosecuted to judgment cannot thereafter claim as beneficiary under the benefit certificate[67] although she omits to name herself as widow among the beneficiaries in the death action;[68] and an action by the personal representative[69] or widow[70] of the employee may preclude a recovery of benefits by the mother of the employee

"Double benefit"

In the constitution of a railroad relief association a provision against a "double benefit" is not limited to a cause where the same person is both as beneficiary, or the action by the legal representative may preclude an action by the widow.[71] Where, after the death of the employee, the employer agreed to pay one half of the benefits to decedent's first wife, the beneficiary named, and one half to his second wife, it may not deduct the amount paid the second wife in settlement of her action for damages from the amount due the named beneficiary.[72]

A compulsory nonsuit is a judgment precluding an action for benefits;[73] but an action which is dismissed without prejudice[74] or in which a voluntary nonsuit is taken[75] does not bar the recovery of benefits. Where the employee has taken benefits and thereby elected to release his action for damages, the fact that he thereafter brings an action against the company does not forfeit his right to benefits.[76]

Insurance contract. Where the contract of the employee entering into an employees' relief association is held to be in the nature of insurance, a recovery of benefits under such contract and also as against the master for negligence occasioning the injury does not constitute a double indemnity for the same injury.[77]

Release in full. Notwithstanding a statute providing that the acceptance of benefits under a relief contract shall not bar the right of the employee to recover for the negligence of the employer, the employee after a settlement of his action for damages and receipt of the payment thereunder cannot recover on his relief contract, where the release purports to be in full of all claims and demands growing out of or incident to the injury.[78]

d. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act and some specific state statutes, a contractual provision in a relief plan which requires a beneficiary or injured employee to elect between acceptance of benefits and an action for damages is invalid and neither it nor the acceptance of benefits thereunder bars an action for damages; but it is otherwise under more general state constitutional or statutory provisions.

Statutory and constitutional provisions invalidating agreements between employer and employee, which have for their object the exemption of the employer from liability for negligence or from a duty imposed by statutory or constitutional provisions, have frequently been held not to invalidate the provisions contained in relief department plans whereby the beneficiary or employee is required to elect whether to sue for damages or to accept the benefits secured by the relief plan.[79] However, such provisions in a contract may be invalidated by a statutory prohibition more particularly describing them,[80] under which ordinarily the employer is permitted to diminish the amount of an employee's recovery of damages by a set-off of any sum which it has contributed to him as benefits,[81] and the validity of such statutes has been sustained.[82] A statute providing that an employee may sue and recover both for injuries arising from negligence and any benefit he may be entitled to receive by reason of having been a member of, or a contributor to, a relief department, and declaring null and void any contract provision in violation thereof, precludes a contention that plaintiff, by bringing a personal injury action, voluntarily left the service of his employer and, under his contract, forfeited any right to further payments from the relief department.[83]

A statute providing that acceptance of benefits under a relief department contract shall not operate to bar an action for negligent injury, notwithstanding the previous agreement contained in that contract that it shall have that effect and notwithstanding any subsequent receipt or release given on payment of such sum only as may be due to the employee under the contract, has been held valid.[84] Such a statute applies to a relief contract entered into before the beneficiary of the relief association and the person legally entitled to recover, but means that no recovery may be had by any person against a relief association when the person legally entitled to damages makes a claim against the road.—Fuller v. Baltimore & Ohio Employees' Relief Ass'n, 10 A. 237, 67 Md. 433.

its passage where the injury occurs thereafter,[85] but it does not affect a claim for damages for an injury sustained and for which suit was begun before its enactment.[86] While it does not make the recovery of a judgment for damages operate as a release of benefits, although the judgment has been paid and released in full,[87] it has been held not to render a release given in satisfaction of a claim null and void so that the employee may still have the right to recover his beneficial interest in the hospital fund,[88] or prevent a release given on compromise of a suit for damages from constituting a bar to an action on the relief contract.[89]

The Federal Employers' Liability Act invalidating any contract or device, the purpose of which shall be to enable a common carrier to exempt itself from any liability created by the act, applies to stipulations contained in contracts of membership in relief departments maintained by the employer.[90] This provision has been held applicable to contracts of membership entered into before its enactment,[91] and its validity as so applied has been sustained, as discussed in Commerce § 78 e (4) (b). Under it, an acceptance of benefits by the employee under a relief contract does not bar an action against his employer as to a liability created by the act[92] and does not operate to release a joint tort-feasor from liability beyond the right to set off the amount contributed by the employer to the amount recovered by plaintiff.[93]

It has been variously held that: After recovery and collection of a judgment against the railroad for damages, the employee cannot recover relief benefits notwithstanding the provision of the Employers' Liability Act;[94] where the contract is indivisible, and a part thereof is invalid under the act, the entire contract falls and no action for benefits may be based thereon;[95] where the employer contributes a sum equal to the assessments paid by members, a provision in the contract of a railroad relief society that one half of the sum insured for should be forfeited if the employee or his representative sued the railroad for damages is not void under the act;[96] and that the pendency of an action for injuries does not prevent a recovery of the benefits under a membership certificate.[97]

The provision of the act as to a set-off by the carrier of the amount it has paid or contributed to insurance or relief benefits paid to plaintiff allows such payment or contribution to be set off only against a claim for damages,[98] and not in an action for benefits[99] or on an insurance contract;[1] and it does not authorize a counterclaim on which a separate judgment may be based.[2]

IV. MASTER'S LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO SERVANT

A. NATURE AND EXTENT IN GENERAL

§ 171. In General

In the absence of statutes modifying the rule, and except as the rule is affected by application of the doctrines of assumed risk, contributory negligence, or fellow-servant, the master is liable for personal injuries sustained by the servant while within the course and scope of his employment by reason of the master's negligence; but the master is not an insurer of the employee's safety.

Where the relation of master and servant exists, the master is liable to the servant for personal in-employer agrees to take due and ordinary care not to expose the servant to extraordinary risk and danger in the course of his employment.[12] The rules governing the employer's liability must have a practical, and not a technical or pedantic or censorious, application.[13]

Physical wants of employee. In the absence of a contract or custom to the contrary, the employer is not required to provide for the physical wants of the employee,[14] although such duty may be imposed by contract.[15]

§ 172. What Law Governs

The law of the place where the injury occurs ordinarily controls as to the existence of a cause of action against the master arising out of an injury to the servant, and the law of the forum controls as to matters relating to the remedy.

In accordance with general rules, the law of the place where the injury occurs or the lex loci delicti controls as to the existence of a cause of action against the master arising out of an injury to the servant,[16] particularly where the contract of employment is there made and to be performed[17] and the negligence complained of there occurs,[18] while the law of the forum controls as to matters relating to the remedy.[19] The rule applies although the contract was made in the state where the action is brought,[20] and the mere fact that the foreign law greatly differs from that of the forum will not prevent its application.[21] Where the contract is made within the state, however, the state may fix the liabilities as between the master and servant which will arise out of, and become incident to, the contract of employment, whether the negligent injury occurred within the state or outside of it, where the employee is outside the state on the business of the employer and pursuant to the contract made in the state.[22]

Maritime law. Where the place in which the injury to the servant is committed brings it within the jurisdiction of admiralty, but the character of the act allows an action to be brought in a state court, the rights and liabilities of the parties are, under the views of some decisions, measured by the maritime law,[23] and according to other decisions by the com-

§ 173. Statutory Provisions

a. In general
b. State employers' liability acts
c. Federal Employers' Liability Act
d. Federal Safety Appliance Act
e. Federal Boiler Inspection Act
f. Occupational diseases acts

a. In General

The law concerning the employer's responsibility for personal injury to an employee, arising in the course of employment, may be altered by legislation in the public interest; and, where the provision is not arbitrary and unreasonable, liability may be imposed on the employer although he is not at fault.

The rules of law concerning the employer's responsibility for personal injury to an employee, arising in the course of employment may be altered by legislation in the public interest,[25] and, where the provision is not arbitrary and unreasonable, liability may be imposed on the employer, although he is not at fault.[26] Hence, as shown in the C.J.S. title Workmen's Compensation Acts § 1 et seq, also 71 C.J. p 225 note 1 et seq, there has been a widespread adoption of statutes ordinarily known as workmen's compensation acts by which the previous rights and liabilities of employee and employer in the case of injury to the servant, arising out of and in the course of his employment, are displaced by a new plan of compensation. Distinct from these statutes, as shown infra subdivisions b, c of this section, there are or have been in force in many jurisdictions statutes commonly known as employers' liability acts which, while recognizing the necessity of fault on the part of the employer, have nevertheless abrogated or limited certain of the defenses previously regarded as available to him.

Furthermore, as shown in other parts of this title, other statutes with regard to employers generally, or in particular industries, impose duties as to the furnishing of a safe place to work and proper or specified equipment or appliances, see infra § 202 et seq, or, as to safeguarding dangerous machinery, see infra § 232, or prescribe regulations as to methods of work, rules, etc., see infra § 264, these statutes being in some instances merely declaratory of the common law.[27] Such statutes do not apply to injuries occurring prior to their taking effect,[28] although they are applicable to existing employments as to injuries subsequently occurring.[29]

State statutes giving a lien or privilege against the ship for damages arising from negligence in its management have been held inapplicable to the right of seamen to recover against their employing ship for personal injuries caused by such negligence;[30] but, under a state statute permitting recovery for damages caused by ships navigating the waters of the state, it has been held that a seaman injured by reason of defective appliances aboard a ship navigating such waters may recover.[31]

The repeal of an act giving plaintiff a right of action by an act which is a substantial reënactment of its provisions, and which amplifies its scope, will not operate to deprive plaintiff of his rights.[32] Where a cause of action has accrued, it may be saved on repeal of the statute under which it arises by a general saving statute.[33]

b. State Employers' Liability Acts

The employer's liability for an injury to an employee may be governed by employers' liability acts which have been adopted in some states, and which are usually upheld and liberally construed; but in the absence of express provision such statutes do not prevent the maintenance of a common-law action.

The liability of an employer for injuries to his employee may be governed by employers' liability acts which have been adopted in some states,[34] the purpose of which is to extend the rights of the employees and to limit the defenses previously accorded to employers.[35] Such statutes have, as a rule,[36] although not without exception,[37] been held constitutional. They are liberally construed to effectuate their purposes,[38] but cannot be given a meaning plainly repugnant to their terms[39] or be held to impose burdens not contemplated and not fairly within their provisions.[40] They have operation only in the territory over which the legislature making them has authority.[41]

Negligence on the part of the master is ordinarily,[42] although not uniformly,[43] requisite to sustain an action under such statutes. Where the statute, as respects negligence, does not define the duties of an employer to his employees, the common-law of master and servant must be considered in connection therewith.[44]

Plaintiff must show that he comes within the statutory provisions,[45] and, as discussed infra § 175, the relationship of employer and employee must exist.

Liability under employers' liability act cannot be predicated on mere fact that work involved risk or danger; breach of duty on part of employer must be shown.—Ferretti v. Southern Pac. Co., 57 P.2d 1280, 154 Or. 97.

Excuse

A court may reduce a statutory penalty exacted by the state for the failure of a violator to appreciate his obligation to the commonwealth but there is no authority for excusing an employer for his failure to comply with legal requirements for the care of his employees.—Hicks v. Hazardous employments

(1) Where the statute relates to hazardous occupations, if employee is engaged in occupation classified as hazardous, employer is liable for any accident, resulting from one of conditions of occupation, even though such condition was not one which induced legislature to classify occupation as hazardous.—Tarbell v. Rivera, 251 P. 553, 31 Ariz. 214—Phoenix Tempe Stone Co. v. Jenkins, 237 P. 194, 28 Ariz. 291.

(2) The injury need not necessarily have been caused by reason of risk or danger inherent in the occupation, but may have arisen from the manner in which the business is carried on.—Tarbell v. Rivera, supra—Phoenix-Tempe Stone Co. v. Jenkins, supra—Consolidated Arizona Smelting Co. v. Egich, 199 P. 132, 22 Ariz. 543.

(3) Under some statutes the act

The employers' liability acts have been held to give a new cause of action for injury to a servant,[46] but they do not take away from an employee any cause of action which he had at common law,[47] and unless they expressly so provide they do not prevent the maintenance of a common-law action, although the negligence giving rise to it may be included in that defined by them,[48] and, where a common-law action is so brought, the common law controls as to the rights of the parties.[49] Where a particular injury does not fall within the provisions of an employers' liability act, the liability of defendant is to be determined under the common law and statutes of the state other than such act.[50]

Where an employee claimed compensation under the statute, the employer may settle all claims by having his insurance carrier pay for a release notwithstanding there was no liability under the statute.[51]

c. Federal Employers' Liability Act

(1) In general
(2) Federal or state law as controlling

(1) In General

The Federal Employers' Liability Act, which was passed to enlarge the rights of employees to recover against railroad companies when engaged in interstate commerce, is constitutional and is to be liberally construed; but it does not make the railroad an insurer nor does it authorize a recovery in the absence of negligence.

The Federal Employers' Liability Act of 1908, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 51–59, applicable to common carriers by railroad,[52] which was passed to enlarge the rights of employees to recover against railroad companies applies only to employments involving a risk of danger, and which are inherently dangerous, whether due to, or caused by, machinery or otherwise, and comprehends hazardous occupations in general, specifically enumerated or otherwise.

Or.—Freeman v. Wentworth & Irwin, 7 P.2d 796, 139 Or. 1.

(4) The business of operating service and gasoline filling station and the employment of a station attendant were not within such act.—Union Oil Co. of California v. Hunt, supra.

(5) Employer operating logging camp engaged in "hazardous occupation" within act.—Brady v. Oregon Lumber Co., 243 P. 96, 117 Or. 188, 45 A.L.R. 812, rehearing denied 245 P. 732, 118 Or. 15, 45 A.L.R. 812.

(6) Master was held not liable under hazardous employment statute for injury to mine employee performing nonhazardous work with which hazardous feature of blasting had no causal connection.—Cummer Lumber Co. v. Silas, 125 So. 372, 98 Fla. 1158.

Character of service

(1) Whether employers' liability act applies to employee depends on character of service as determined by employment contract, not work he was doing when injured.—Fitzgerald v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co., 16 P.2d 27, 141 Or. 1.

(2) Employee need not be actively engaged in his work to be within protection of act.—Fitzgerald v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co., supra.

Manual or mechanical labor

A local bill clerk for a railroad is not engaged in "manual or mechanical labor" within employers' liability act, although occasionally at other times than when injured he did manual labor in loading and unloading live stock and freight, "mechanical labor" being skilled labor employed in making and repairing tools and instruments, and "manual labor," under such paragraph, meaning actual physical contact with the dangerous instruments.—Arizona Eastern R. Co. v. Matthews, 180 P. 159, 20 Ariz. 282, 7 A.L.R. 1149.

Work directly contributing to operation of railroad

(1) State railroad employers' liability act was construed to cover injuries to railroad employees while engaged in any part of work connected with, and necessarily and directly contributing to, operation of railroad or handling or movement of any train, engine or car over it.—Palmer v. Great Northern Ry. Co., Mont., 170 P.2d 768.

(2) The employment of sweeper or laborer in and about railway company's shops, where its engines were taken down, repaired and generally overhauled, was work done by him necessarily and directly contributed to operation of railroad.—Palmer v. Great Northern Ry. Co., supra.

Word "works" in employers' liability act means employer's entire plant, including all realty, buildings, and machinery used in particular business.—Fitzgerald v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co., 16 P.2d 27, 141 Or. 1.

Plaintiff employé's right to compensation under employers' liability act for injuries was a vested right, which could not be taken away by repeal of such act, which constituted a part of plaintiff's contract with her employer.—Reynolds v. E. Clemens Horst Co., 170 P. 1082, 35 Cal.App. 711.

The expression "by railroad" is but descriptive of the kind of common carrier to which act relates, distinguishing railroads from other kinds of common carriers to which act does not extend, and it was not intended to define the kinds of instrumentalities used on which railroads' liability for negligence should exist or by which it should be limited.—Hamarstrom v. Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co., 116 S.W.2d 280, 286, 233 Mo.App. 1103, certiorari quashed State ex rel. Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co. v. Employee of carrier engaged in interstate commerce cannot be made when engaged in interstate commerce,[53] is constitutional[54] and, as discussed in Commerce § 78 e (4) (a), supersedes, where the railroad and employee are engaged in interstate commerce, the laws of the several states in so far as they cover the same field. This statute is not a compensation act[55] and there is a very clear distinction between it and ordinary workmen's compensation laws.[56] The act declares two distinct and independent liabilities resting on the common foundation of a wrongful injury;[57] it is not restricted to cases where death has occurred, but applies as well to those who are injured but who are not killed.[58] While held not to create a new cause of action,[59] the act modifies common-law rules as to certain defenses.[60]

Terminal company
A terminal company engaged in furnishing terminal facilities and services which in their relation to the public demonstrate their nature as a common calling is a common carrier within the Federal Employers' Liability Act.—Fort Street Union Depot Co. v. Hillen, C.C.A.Mich., 119 F.2d 307, certiorari denied 62 S.Ct. 82, 314 U.S. 642, 86 L.Ed. 515.

Motor carriers

Effect of private contract
Where a railroad company under a contract to act "solely as a bridge carrier in a private capacity" agreed to furnish transportation facilities and employees to a company engaged in freight forwarding, the contract could not affect the legal rights of those not parties to it or abrogate rights of railroad's employees to compensation under Federal Employers' Liability Act for injuries received in performing services for freight forwarder.—Sherman v. Modification of common-law barriers
One of main purposes of act was to modify the common-law barriers against recovery by an employee in a suit against his employer predicated on industrial accident.—Terminal R. Ass'n of St. Louis v. Schorb, C.C.A.Mo., 151 F.2d 361, certiorari denied 66 S.Ct. 470, 326 U.S. 786, 90 L.Ed. 477.

Act of 1906
(1) As discussed in Commerce § 78 e (4) (a), the prior act of 1906 was held unconstitutional as far as it amounted to a regulation of intrastate, as well as of interstate, commerce.

(2) It was, however, held valid as far as it related to the District of Columbia and the territories.—El Paso & Northeastern R. Co. v. Gutierrez, Tex., 30 S.Ct. 21, 215 U.S. 87, 54 L.Ed. 106—39 C.J. p 265 notes 11, 12.

Amendment of statute

(1) Amendment extending scope of act must be liberally construed.

Md.—Albright v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 37 A.2d 870, 183 Md. 421, certiorari denied 65 S.Ct. 72, 323 U.S. 735, 89 L.Ed. 589.

(2) The purpose of the 1939 amendment was to broaden the field in which the federal remedy is applicable.
Cal.—Copley v. Industrial Accident Commission, 120 P.2d 879, 19 Cal. 2d 287, certiorari denied 62 S.Ct. 1108, 316 U.S. 678, 86 L.Ed. 1752.
Tenn.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Potts, 158 S.W.2d 729, 178 Tenn. 425.

(3) But amendment could not be construed on theory that purpose of amendment was to bring all cases of injuries to railroad employees within the act, and that amending act was retrospective.—Painter v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 13 A.2d 396, 339 Pa. 271, certiorari denied 61 S. Ct. 62, 311 U.S. 683, 85 L.Ed. 441.

Contractual exemption from liability

Federal Employers' Liability Act § 5, 45 U.S.C.A. § 55, providing that any contract, the purpose or intent of which is to enable any common carrier to exempt itself from any liability created by the act, shall be to that extent void, applies to all sections of the act and not merely to the first section, which has to do with the general liability of employers.—Fleming v. servant.[70] The employer is liable for injuries resulting from negligence within the statute,[71] and the act is broad enough to cover any negligence for which a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce can be responsible to its employees therein,[72] and it is not limited to the negligence of fellow servants.[73] The word "negligence" as used in the act may be read to include all the meanings given to it by courts, and within the word as ordinarily used,[74] and comprehends any negligence of the employer causing or proximately contributing to the injury, whether antecedent or subsequent to negligence of the employee.[75]

(2) Federal or State Law as Controlling

(a) In general

(b) As to what constitutes negligence

(a) In General

An action brought in a state court under the Federal Employers' Liability Act is governed as to matters of substantive law by such act and the principles of common law as established and applied in the federal courts; but the state law controls as to other matters which are not provided for by the federal statute and as to all matters of practice and procedure except in so far as they may have been modified by the statute. The federal law is exclusive in operation.

An action brought in a state court under the Federal Employers' Liability Act is governed as to matters of substantive law by such act and the principles of common law as established and applied in the federal courts.[76] Thus the federal law and decisions control in determining the questions of the

Refusal of federal courts to follow state law and decisions of state courts as to questions with relation to Federal Employers' Liability Act see Federal Courts § 189 b.

Rules of general application

The rules of liability under the Federal Employers' Liability Act are of general application and in such respect wholly unlike local statutes peculiar to the legislative policy of a single state.—Murnan v. Wabash R. Co., 158 N.E. 508, 246 N.Y. 244, 54 A.L.R. 1522.

Protection accorded federal rights

The rights which the Federal Employers' Liability Act creates are federal rights protected by federal rather than local rules of law, and the federal rules have been largely fashioned from the common law except as congress has written into the act different standards.

Effect of denial of certiorari

While the action of the United States supreme court in denying a petition for certiorari is not necessarily to be considered a controlling precedent, yet, where that tribunal denied a writ of certiorari to review the judgment of a state court holding the Federal Employers' Liability Act inapplicable, it must be inferred that the denial of the writ was a ruling to the effect that the act was not applicable.—Capps v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 101 S.E. 216, 178 N.C. 558, certiorari denied 40 S.Ct. 345, 252 U.S. 580, 64 L.Ed. 726.

Reason for rule

The condition in the act that no action shall be maintained thereunder unless commenced within two years from the time the cause of action accrued is not an ordinary statute of limitations. It affects the right and not the remedy and makes time the essence of the right, so that the right is lost if the time is disregarded.

Okl.—Moore v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 104 P.2d 236, 187 Okl. 534.

39 C.J. p 914 note 61.

Tolling or extending statute

(1) The limitation provision of the Federal Employers' Liability Act is not tolled or extended by the provisions of a state statute tolling or extending statutes of limitations because of the injured person's infancy.—Gillett v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 102 A. 673, 91 N.J.Law 220—39 C.J. p 914 note 61 [a].

(2) A similar rule applies as to state statutes tolling or extending statutes of limitations because of the injured person's insanity.—Alvarado v. Southern Pac. Co., Tex.Civ.App., 193 S.W. 1108.

(3) A state statute of limitations providing that, where an action commenced in time terminates otherwise than on the merits, a new action may be commenced within a specified time, does not extend the period of limitations fixed by the Federal Employers' Liability Act on which an employee's action is based.
U.S.—Bell v. Wabash Ry. Co., C.C.A. Mo., 58 F.2d 569.

Reason for rule

In an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the rule as to the burden and quantum of proof necessary to require a submission of the issues to the jury is of the substance of the cause of action.

In Tennessee

(1) It was declared that the federal rule as to the quantum and character of evidence justifying submission to the jury was announced for the courts of the United States only, and that no purpose had been declared to force it on the state courts.—Brenizer v. Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry., 3 S.W.2d 1053, 156 Tenn. 479, rehearing denied 8 S.W.2d 1099, 156 Tenn. 479.

(2) In a subsequent case the state court noted such contention had been disapproved, in effect, by the United States Supreme Court, but declared that it was unnecessary to pass on the question under the facts of the particular case.—Luck v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 69 S.W.2d 899, 167 Tenn. 350.

(3) Thereafter it was said that the decision in the first case will be treated as setting forth the procedural rule to be followed in the state court.—Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. v. Hines, 94 S.W.2d 397, 20 Tenn. App. 1.

"When an action is instituted in a state court under said [Federal Employers' Liability] act, the rules of pleading, practice, and procedure of the state wherein the suit is brought control in so far as thereby no substantive right or defense arising under the act is lessened or destroyed."—Ross v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 172 So. 752, 753, 178 Miss. 69.

Nature and purport of declaration which alleged violation of a common-law duty owed by employer to an employee, but which answer alleged set forth a cause of action exclusively governed by the Federal Employers' Liability Act was to be determined in accordance with state law, the adjudication of a federal question not being involved.—Tanona v. New York, N. H. & H. R. R., 18 N. E.2d 163, 301 Mass. 589.

Identical rules under federal and state laws
In action for personal injury sustained by switchman, where counts under common law as aided by state workmen's compensation law and under federal Employers' Liability Act were joined, it was held that the rules of evidence and elements of damages were identical under the laws.—Hatch v. Portland Terminal Co., 131 A. 5, 125 Me. 96.

Common-law rules
In administering the Federal Employers' Liability Act in a state court the rules of practice and procedure followed in the trial of common-law actions should be observed except in so far as the act itself changes or modifies those rules.

Statutory rule of evidence
State privileged communications statute, being mere rule of evidence, is applicable in action under Federal Employers' Liability Act.—New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Jackson, 110 So. 586, 145 Miss. 702.

Pendency of action
Where action under Federal Employers' Liability Act was commenced within two years after injury in city court which had no jurisdiction of the subject matter because injury occurred outside territorial limits of city, and subsequently the city court entered an order purporting to transfer case to circuit court, whether any case was pending in state court was a question to be determined by state law as interpreted by state supreme court.—Herb v. Reduction of damages time[90] and in such manner[91] as will entitle them to consideration under the state's established system of practice and pleading.
In action for injuries to switchman under Federal Employers' Liability Act, state supreme court had power to modify judgment conditionally by reducing damages.—Roy v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., 42 P.2d 476, 55 Idaho 404, certiorari denied Oregon Short Line R. Co. v. Roy, 56 S.Ct. 89, 296 U.S. 579, 80 L.Ed. 409.

Exclusiveness of federal remedy. The federal law is exclusive in operation, not merely cumulative,[92] and it is error to give instructions on the state law;[93] but where, under the pleadings and evidence, there is an issue of fact as to whether a federal law is applicable, cases may be submitted to the jury under proper instructions as to both aspects of it.[94] If no recovery can be had under the federal law, in a case to which it is properly applicable, plaintiff has no other remedy.[95] If a plaintiff expressly bases his action on the Federal Employers' Liability Act, that act governs;[96] so, where plaintiff resists removal of an action from the state court where it is pending to the federal court, on the ground that the federal act gives him the right to sue in the state court, it constitutes an election to proceed under the federal law and is binding on him.[97]

Where plaintiff's case was tried and submitted to the jury on the theory that he was within the protection of the federal act, he must either stand or fall on the proposition that he is entitled to recover under that act,[98] and a judgment for plaintiff in such action cannot be sustained as a judgment in a common-law action for negligence.[99] If state and federal statutes are substantially similar,[1] or the rules of law governing the trial of issues under such statutes are the same, no question of jurisdiction being involved,[2] it is immaterial whether the action is brought under the one or the other. The facts and not the pleadings determine whether the injury in any case gives a right of recovery under the federal or under a state statute,[3] and a carrier is not estopped to urge that its liability is measured by the federal act by having pleaded contributory negligence and thus having relied on the state law.[4] The federal act, although exclusive as to cases within its provisions so far as the employer is concerned, does not preclude a remedy against another party to the wrong.[5] The right to proceed under the federal statute may be waived.[6]

(b) As to What Constitutes Negligence

Since the Federal Employers' Liability Act does not define negligence, the question of whether the acts complained of amount to negligence is to be determined according to the common law as applied in the federal courts.

mined according to the common law[7] as applied in the federal courts,[8] and it has been held that, in the case of a conflict between the decisions of the state and of the federal courts as to what constitutes common-law negligence, the federal rule prevails.[9] Some courts have, however, taken the view that since there is no federal common law, the common law of the state is the law of the case.[10]

d. Federal Safety Appliance Act

Refusal of federal courts to follow state law and decisions of state courts as to questions with rela-remedy under the act are left to state law.[17] Where an action is based on a violation of the Federal Safety Appliance Act, the liability will be enforced by the courts of one state without reference to the laws of another state in which the injury occurred.[18] The fact that the employment was procured through false representations by the employee as to his former employment[19] and as to his physical condition[20] has been held not available as a defense. Where it is not clear whether plaintiff relies on the Federal Employers' Liability Act or the Safety Appliance Act, the former necessarily applies, since it controls the liability of an employer to the employee, whether the employer has violated the Safety Appliance Act or has been guilty of general negligence.[21]

e. Federal Boiler Inspection Act

The construction placed on the Federal Boiler Inspection Act by the federal courts is binding on state courts in interstate cases. The act prescribes no form of action to be pursued for a recovery of damages for its breach.

The construction placed upon the Federal Boiler Inspection Act by the federal courts is binding on state courts in interstate cases,[22] and a state court must follow the federal rule in determining the sufficiency of the evidence to show a violation of the act.[23] The act prescribes no form of action to be pursued for a recovery of damages for its breach.[24]

f. Occupational Diseases Acts

Statutes requiring the employer to adopt approved devices or means for the prevention of occupational diseases are constitutional if not too vague, indefinite, uncertain, or incomplete. They do not make an employer an insurer against any occupational disease, but make him liable if such a disease is contracted by an employee as a direct result of his failure to comply with their requirements.

Under the statutes in some jurisdictions the employer is required to adopt and provide reasonable and approved devices or means for the prevention of occupational diseases.[25] Such statutes have been held constitutional,[26] but not where their provisions are so vague, indefinite, uncertain, or incomplete that no sufficiently clear and intelligible standard of duty is defined thereby.[27] They must be given a reasonable construction which will tend to effect the purpose of the legislature.[28] These statutes do not make an employer an insurer against any occupational disease;[29] they make him liable if such a disease is contracted by an employee as a direct result of his failure to comply with their requirements.[30] In order to bring a case within the provisions of such a statute, it must be shown that the disease contracted by an employee is an occupational disease incident or peculiar to his work.[31]

§ 174. Relation of Parties; Course and Scope of Employment

As a general rule, before one can claim the status of an employee entitled to recover as such against his employer for personal injuries, he must be engaged by another person to perform work or services as directed and controlled by the employer and on the latter's promise to pay compensation for such services.

As affecting the question of the master's liability for injuries to his servant, a master has the absolute right to say who his servants shall be[32] and to fix the scope of their employment and the limits of their authority.[33] As a general rule, before one can claim the status of an employee entitled to recover as such against his employer for personal injuries, he must be engaged by another person to perform work or services as directed and controlled by the employer and on the latter's promise to pay compensation for such services.[34]

There must be a contract between the employer and employee, and a meeting of the minds,[35] although an express contract is not required.[36] This relation is usually dependent on the right to direct the manner in which the work should be done,[37] but not necessarily so,[38] and its existence is determined by ascertaining whose work was being performed at the time of the injury.[39] Although it is sometimes difficult to determine whose servant one is when performing a particular duty,[40] direction and control of the work being done are usually determinative,[41] and the test is the right to exercise such control rather than the actual exercise of the power to control.[42] Relevant considerations are selection and engagement,[43] the right of immediate discharge of the employee by the employer,[44] the right of the employee to quit at any time,[45] and loss, if any, to be stood by the employer;[46] but they are not conclusive,[47] and each case must be decided on its peculiar facts.[48] Where performance of his duties by the servant would, because of his condition, be a violation of the law, he is a trespasser when he comes on the master's premises to undertake such performance.[49]

Where the statute has defined "employer" and "employee," the statutory definitions prevail over the common-law definitions of the terms in cases coming within the purview of the statute.[50] In the absence of statutory definition of the terms, the courts will construe in their natural sense, to describe the conventional relation of master and servant, the words "employee" and "employed" as used in the federal[51] and state[52] employers' liability acts; and such terms refer to persons who are working for the employer at his request and under agreement to compensate them for their services.[53]

§ 175. —— Necessity for Relation of Master and Servant

Existence of the relation of master and servant between the parties at the time of the injury is essential in order to charge one as master in an action for personal injuries sustained by an alleged servant, and, accordingly, a contractee who has not reserved the right to direct the manner of performance of the contract is not liable, as master, for personal injuries suffered by an independent contractor.

Existence of the relation of master and servant between the parties at the time of the injury is essential in order to charge one as master in an action for personal injuries sustained by an alleged servant,[60] as in actions brought under the Federal Employers' Liability Act,[61] state employers' liability acts,[62] or, likewise, in actions brought under the

Federal Safety Appliance Act;[63] and it has been held that, even though the relation exists, a master will be absolved from liability when, from the character of his business and the influence of organizations controlling labor, he has no power of selection in the employment of servants.[64]

It follows that a contractee is not liable, as master, for personal injuries suffered by an independent contractor;[65] but, where the contractee reserves the right to direct the manner of performance of the contract in any particular, he is liable as an employer for his negligence.[66] Since the relation of master and servant, as discussed supra § 3 (1), does not exist between one employing an independent contractor and the servants of the independent contractor, and since the servants of the independent contractor and the servants of the contractee, as considered infra § 330, are not as a rule fellow servants, the liability of the contractee for injuries to servants of an independent contractor is treated infra §§ 600–606 in connection with the liability of a master for injuries to third persons. An independent contractor is liable for negligent injuries to his servant, however, regardless of whether another party may also be liable.[67]

§ 176. —— Employment of Convict Labor

According to some authority there is no relation of master and servant between a contractor who contracts with the state for convict labor and a convict, and a convict cannot recover for injuries resulting from the negligence of the contractor, at least where the state retains full control and management of the convict.

There is authority holding that there is no relation of master and servant between a contractor who contracts with the state for labor of convicts and the convicts,[68] and that the contractor is not liable to the convict for injuries resulting from such contractor's negligence,[69] at least where the state retains full control and management of the convict.[70] On the other hand, it is generally held, in the absence of complete control by the state, that a convict is the servant of the contractor to whom he is hired out, although his wages go to the county or the state, and he may maintain an action against the contractor if he is injured by reason of his negligence, or by defective machinery furnished by him,[71] although as far as his injuries affect his ability to labor during the period of his imprisonment, he cannot recover.[72] If he has petitioned the legislature for relief and obtained it, the convict cannot afterward maintain an action against the contractor to recover damages for the same injury.[73]

Travelers crossing railroad
The Employers' Liability Act has no application to injuries sustained in a railroad crossing collision where there was no contractual relation between the owner of the railroad and the owner or occupants of the automobile.—Hornschuch v. Southern Pac. Co., 203 P. 886, 101 Or. 280.

§ 177. —— Volunteers

One who voluntarily assumes to act as the servant of another cannot recover for personal injuries as a servant, although requested to act by a servant of the master, but the rule is otherwise where the volunteer has an interest in the work.

A person who voluntarily assumes to act as the servant of another cannot recover for personal injuries as a servant.[74] The fact that a volunteer was requested or ordered by a servant of the master to give his assistance will not authorize him to recover for personal injuries on the ground that he thereby became a servant of the employer,[75] in the absence of acquiescence or consent,[76] or unless, by reason of his position or the necessities of the case, such servant had the authority to make the request,[77] as in the case of a sudden emergency.[78]

Interest in work. Where the servant of one master has an interest in the work in any proper capacity and at the request or with the consent of another servant undertakes to assist in the work, he does not do so at his own risk, and, if he is injured by their carelessness, their master is responsible.[79]

Minors. The rule that a volunteer cannot recover for personal injuries as a servant applies equally to minors,[80] and this is particularly so where the minor acts on the invitation of a servant of the employer in violation of a statute forbidding the employment of infants.[81]

§ 178. —— Traffic Arrangements and Other Contracts between Railroads

As a general rule the liability of a railroad company for injury to its employees resulting from its own negligence is unaffected by the existence of a traffic arrangement or other contract with another railroad; but the authorities differ as to whether such an employer is liable for injuries to its employees resulting from negligence of the other railroad.

Where two railroad companies have a servant in common who is injured while working for, and under the control of, one of them, that one is liable;[82] and a servant in the general employment and pay of one road, but engaged in special services for another through an agreement between the roads, may recover from the one for whom such special services are performed for an injury received by rea-

"Emergency employee" is one who renders aid to the servant of another at the request of the servant and under circumstances which create a necessity for aid.—Cannon v. Fargo, 122 N.Y.S. 576, 579, 138 App. Div. 20—20 C.J. p 1244 note 34.

What constitutes emergency

(1) Authority in servant to employ another to assist him in master's service may only be implied when emergency confronting servant is a real one, and it is not sufficient tnat servant or person employed believes that emergency exists when in fact it does not.

(4) Facilitation of employer's business or employee's task will not authorize latter to employ help.—Henry Quellmalz Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. Hays, 291 S.W. 982, 173 Ark. 43.

(5) Liability of master must be determined on facts of each case.—Bernhardt v. American Ry. Express Co., 218 N.Y.S. 123, 218 App.Div. 195.

Presence or availability of master

Even in emergency, servant is not authorized to employ others in master's work if master is present or may be easily and immediately consulted.—Howland v. Tri-State Theatres Corporation, C.C.A.Neb., 139 F.2d 560.

Request of third person

A mechanic, who was engaged by filling station attendant at request of customer to repair customer's automobile which was stalled on filling station driveway, and was injured while examining such automobile, could not recover of attendant's employer on ground of emergency employment doctrine, since such repair work was at request of customer, although mechanic's knowledge of such fact was immaterial, and was not a part of attendant's duty, as no repair work was done at the station.—Standard Oil Co. v. son of its negligence,[83] and cannot recover from the other, even though the power to direct and control the work was in the latter.[84] The fact that one company's train while on another's tracks was subject to the orders of the latter's trainmaster is not conclusive as to the general employment of the train crew.[85] If another railroad employed defendant railroad to do certain work and defendant used and controlled its own construction crew to perform the work, the relationship of master and servant existed between defendant and an injured member of the crew.[86]

By some authorities it is held that an employee of a railroad permitting another to use its tracks jointly may recover from his employer for injury caused by the negligence of the agents of the licensee,[87] and that a railroad company using the yards of another is liable for that other's negligence in operating a switch engine resulting in injury to one of the user's employees;[88] but on the other hand there is authority to the effect that a railroad company's liability for injuries to one of its employees by cars negligently operated over its tracks by the grantee of a joint operating privilege is not based on its responsibility for the licensee's negligence, and, if its duty as employer has been performed, it is not liable for the negligence of another company using its tracks.[89] A railroad company permitting another company to use its tracks and the latter company are both liable for injuries to an employee of one resulting from negligence chargeable to both companies.[90] Where two railway companies incorporated under the laws of different states, having tracks connecting at the state line and together forming a continuous line of railway, operate through trains over both lines of road having the same operating officers, using the same crews and equipment indiscriminately and paying the operating expenses from a common fund made up from the earnings, an employee so employed who is injured by the negligence of one or both of such companies may recover damages from one or both;[91] and it has been held that, when an agreement between two railroad companies is secret, an employee is not expected to ascertain, when orders are given him by a superior, whether he is working for one or both companies, and he may recover for injuries sustained either against one of the companies or against both jointly.[92] A traffic arrangement whereby, for the purpose of having a continuous line, one company operates the railroads of two others, and the three companies divide the freight, does not constitute an agency making the employees of the operating company the employees of the other two.[93]

is operated by a lessee, the lessor is liable to its own employees who are injured by the negligence of the lessee in the operation of its trains[94] to the same extent as it would be to a stranger so injured;[95] but the view has been taken that the servant of the lessor is not a third person or member of the public and that the lessor is not liable to him except for its failure to maintain the road, stations, houses, and the like in a reasonably safe condition.[96] A railroad using under lease or running privileges a track of another railroad is not relieved from liability to its employees for defects in its construction or condition because the other company maintains it.[97] An illegal lease of the equipment of a railroad does not of itself make an injured employee pro hac vice the servant of the lessor.[98] As regards liability for injury to an employee of the lessee resulting from the negligence of the switching crew of a railroad leasing terminal facilities, such crew has been held employees of the lessee in the absence of a showing that, while serving the lessee, they were under the sole direction and control of the lessor.[99]

§ 179. —— Arrangements and Other Contracts between Railroads and Companies Other than Railroad Companies

An employee of a company such as a Pullman, express, or construction company, having an arrangement or other contract with a railroad company, has been held not an employee of the latter so as to make it liable as master for personal injuries to such employee.

An employee of a Pullman company, amenable only to the orders of such company[1] and having no responsibility for the running of a railroad company's trains,[2] even though he customarily collected railroad tickets during the night hours and delivered them to the train conductor[3] and was required to keep the Pullman cars free from trespassers,[4] is not an employee of such railway company, while being transported in the course of his employment under a contract between the two companies, so as to make the latter liable to him as an employee for injuries sustained.

Also, a contract between a railway company and an express company to furnish transportation for messengers in charge of express matter has been held not to make such a messenger an employee of the railroad company,[5] but an express agent acting not only as a messenger for the express company, but also in a capacity of baggage master for the railroad, is an employee of both.[6] Where a railroad company is constructing a railroad through a corporation created, officered, and financed by it, an employee on such construction work is an employee of the railroad company and may recover from it for injuries due to negligent construction and inspection.[7] A railroad company which has become the owner of a portion of a railroad track, on payment of the cost of construction to a construction company, is not liable for injuries to an employee of the latter caused by the negligence of other employees of that company on a portion of the track not yet turned over to the railroad, even though the stockholders and general officers of the two companies are largely the same.[8] A railroad leasing the use of its track to a construction company is not liable for negligence of the lessee to an employee of the lessor, unless the negligence of the lessor concurred with the negligence of the lessee in bringing about the result.[9]

§ 180. —— Commencement, Suspension, or Termination of Relation

a. In general
b. Incidental interruptions
c. After working hours
d. Transfer of master's business or service of employee
e. Fraud or misrepresentation

a. In General

A master's duty to protect his servant, and liability for injuries resulting from his failure to do so, are not necessarily confined to the precise period during which the services are actively rendered, but continue as long as the servant may be said to be actually or constructively in his employment and under his control, and may exist while the servant is on the premises of the master in anticipation of his work or while he is on his way to or from his work.

A master's duty to protect his servant, and liability for injuries resulting from his failure to do so, are not necessarily confined to the precise period during which the services are actively rendered,[10] but continue as long as the servant may be said to be actually or constructively in his employment and under his control.[11] Although there is some authority to the contrary,[12] the general rule is that the relation exists when the servant is on the premises of his master in anticipation of his work, although the actual time of taking up his duties has not arrived,[13] but it has been held not to exist where the servant is on the premises unreasonably early and contrary to custom.[14]

The duty and liability also arise in respect of a newly employed servant on the premises in preparation or ready for work,[15] or even to such a servant on his way to employment when he is at the time under the control of the master,[16] but they do not exist in respect of one on the premises seeking work in response to information that men were needed,[17] or where his presence is not reasonably referable to preparation to take up his actual duties.[18] Any activity undertaken by an employee for a private purpose is not within his employment.[19]

On way to and from work. The duty is also held to exist during the servant's carriage to and from

Where plaintiff came to a pharmacy about one-half hour before time to start work in order to get an apron to take to laundry and was hurt in falling through open trap door over a stairway in the rear of the building occupied by her employer, plaintiff, at the time of accident, had the status of an invitee, rather than that of an employee or trespasser, as regarded her right to recover for the injury from her employer.—Whisler v. his business by his master, by consent, custom, or contract;[20] and a railroad employee who has been discharged but has returned by agreement, to turn over his duties to his successor, is, while returning home thereafter on one of the company's trains, still in the employ of the railroad.[21] It has been held, however, that the mere permission[22] or custom[23] to ride to and from work on the cars of an employer will not establish the relation in the absence of evidence to show that such was because of, and a part of, the contract of employment; and the master is not liable for injuries resulting to the servant while riding from work on the vehicle of an independent contractor in the absence of an agreement or obligation on the part of the master to provide transportation.[24]

It has also been held that an employee, being carried to her work on an elevator operated by her employer for the benefit of all the occupants of the building and the public generally as well as its employees was not a servant at such time, but a passenger.[25] The relation continues during the servant's progress to or from his place of work along a path or way over his master's premises which he and other employees are accustomed to use;[26] and, where the duties or place of employment of a railroad employee involve the use of the railroad tracks of the employer in going to and from his work, the relation will continue while they are so being used,[27] but the duty of a master does not extend to one whose duties are not of such a character,[28] or to an employee who uses tracks to an unnecessary extent,[29] or in a dangerous way.[30]

An injured servant, being transported on the master's train to a place where medical attention may be obtained, is not an employee of the railroad company so as to entitle him to the care which the company would owe him under other circumstances,[31] but, where the contract of employment expressly requires the company to furnish medical treatment, free transportation on the employer's railroad from the place of work to the company doctor is impliedly

Transportation in own vehicle
Generally, an employee on the way to work is not in the course of employment, and is not in actual performance of duty, but where employer furnishes transportation, the employee is actually on duty when he begins to use such transportation, whether it be in a vehicle supplied by the employer or one of his own substituted for the same mission.—Heaps v. Cobb, 45 A.2d 73, 185 Md. 372.

Test in determining whether employee is considered on duty while using transportation furnished by employer is whether the transportation was furnished by the employer as an incident of employment and the nature of the mission on which employee was engaged.—Heaps v. Cobb, supra.

included, and hence an employee so riding is not a mere licensee.[32]

A servant, temporarily laid off, who goes on the master's premises, is a mere trespasser.[33]

b. Incidental Interruptions

Neither the period nor continuity of service is changed by an incidental cessation from work or by a brief incidental absence from the scene of work, although an interruption solely for the employee's convenience and advantage will suspend the relation.

Neither the period nor continuity of service is changed by an incidental cessation from work or by a brief incidental absence from the scene of work,[34] but an interruption permitted solely for the employees's convenience and advantage will suspend the relation.[35] Thus, the relation continues when the servant has left his place of work merely to obtain a drink of water[36] or milk,[37] and it is not interrupted by an intermission for lunch or dinner,[38] although there is some authority holding that the relation does not exist while the employee was on the employer's premises during the lunch hour, but was off duty at the time.[39]

The relation does not continue in respect of a servant who leaves the premises for luncheon at a place of his own selection,[40] or who is on his way in disobedience of orders,[41] or who has left the premises during the noon hour on business of his own,[42] or who voluntarily and unnecessarily leaves his place of employment and assumes a position of peril merely for his own pleasure or convenience.[43] An employee who was injured during a rest period while on the premises of the employer cannot recover from the employer on the theory that he had been invited on the premises other than as an employee.[44]

c. After Working Hours

Although the master generally is not liable for injuries to his servant occurring after working hours, the relation continues and the duty exists for a reasonable time after the work has actually ceased. Where living or sleeping quarters are provided for a servant as incidental to his employment, the duty of the master continues while the servant is on the premises so provided and during his progress to and from such premises.

Although, in general, a master is not liable to his servant for injuries occurring after working hours,[45] the relation continues and the duty exists for a reasonable time after work has actually ceased for purposes incidental to the employment,[46] and until the employee has been given an opportunity to leave the premises.[47] While the fact that an employee is subject to call in an emergency does not prolong the hours of labor so as to continue the relation,[48] where a living or sleeping place is provided for a servant as incidental to his employment and for the convenience of the employer, the duty of the employer continues not only while the servant is on the premises so provided,[49] but also during his progress to and from such premises,[50] or while he was sleeping on the ground outside the place provided because such place was unfit for sleeping.[51] So, it has been held that, where but a short time intervenes between the finishing of an employee's duties on a particular day and his regular hours of work of the following day, remaining on the employer's premises to sleep does not suspend the relation.[52]

d. Transfer of Master's Business or Service of Employee

Where the servant has not been informed of any change, the liability of a master to a servant does not ordinarily cease, although as between the master and a third person a change is made by which thereafter the work is to be done for such third person; but a servant furnished by a general employer to perform a particular service for another under the latter's control is the servant of the latter, and not of the former.

The liability of a master to a servant does not cease, the servant not having been informed of any change, although, as between the master and a third person, a change is made by which thereafter the work is to be done for such third person;[53] nor is the relation ended by reason of the fact that one joint employer, in accordance with an arrangement between himself and the other joint employer, takes on himself the function of a workman.[54] Where a servant is under the control and subject to the orders of the master and under his employ owes obedience to such master and is ordered by such master to assist a third person to do a piece of work, and while so doing he remains under the control and subject to the orders of his master, he does not in such case become the servant of such third person, but remains the servant of his master.[55] Thus, where the owner of a machine hires it, together with the crew to operate it, to a third person, the relation of master and servant exists between the owner and the crew.[56]

On the other hand, a servant furnished by a general employer to perform a particular service for another under the latter's control is the servant of the latter, and not of the former,[57] and the special employer controlling both the employee and the working appliances furnished by the general employer is liable for injuries to him because of neglect to perform the master's duties.[58] Where servants of two persons jointly engage in work of mutual interest to their employers, each employee remains the servant of his own master, although one of them takes orders as to details of the work from the other.[59]

The determining factor is control and supervision,[60] that is, the right to direction and control,[61] rather than actuality of direction and control[62] or payment of wages;[63] and another test is whether the servant willingly and knowingly subjected himself to the other's orders under a new agreement with a new master.[64] As long as the employee is furthering the business of his general employer by the service rendered to another, there will be no inference of a new relation unless command has been surrendered.[65]

A purchaser of a business is not responsible for injuries sustained by an employee before his purchase thereof,[66] and the recording of the lease which provided that the transfer should be regarded as having taken place at a time before the injuries were received cannot alter the fact that the relation of master and servant did not then exist so as to make him liable.[67]

e. Fraud or Misrepresentation

The fact that false statements were made by the servant at the time he secured employment is insufficient to terminate the relation of master and servant existing at the time of the injury, and recovery may be had from the employer for negligent injury to the employee where there is no causal connection between the injury and the misrepresentation or where the latter did not affect the workman's physical fitness to perform his duties; but a contract obtained by fraud through impersonation will bar recovery.

The fact that false statements were made by a servant at the time he secured employment is insufficient to terminate the relation of master and servant existing at the time of the injury,[68] even though they may constitute grounds for rescission of the contract of employment,[69] and recovery may be had from the employer for negligent injury to the employee, at least were there is no causal connection between the injury and the misrepresentation,[70] or where the untrue statement did not affect the workman's physical fitness to perform his duties,[71] even though the misrepresentation concerned the employee's age, and the effect of his injuries might be more serious because of his age than if he were younger.[72] A contract obtained by fraud through another impersonating the employee, however, will bar recovery in an action by the employee for personal injuries.[73]

a. General rule
b. Measure of scope
c. Emergencies
d. Brief cessations from work

a. General Rule

In order to render a master liable as such for personal injuries to his servant, the injuries must have been received in the line of the servant's duty, since the master ordinarily is not liable where the injury is sustained while the servant is acting without the scope of his employment.

In order to render a master liable as such for personal injuries to his servant, the injuries must have been received in the line of the servant's duty, or, as usually expressed, within the scope of his employment.[74] The master is ordinarily not liable where the injury is sustained while the servant is acting

without the scope of his regular employment at the command or request of another servant;[75] and, where the master has forbidden the servant to do a particular act, he is not liable for an injury sustained when the act was performed with the permission of another servant.[76] The servant is within the general scope of his employment, however, where he acts in obedience to an express order of the master,[77] or performs work not strictly within the line of his duty at the command or request of another servant having either express or implied authority to make such command or request,[78] and this is particularly true when a servant is hired by the day, acting under instructions,[79] or when an employee is not engaged for any particular task but to do whatever he may be directed to do.[80] The scope of employment includes not only actual service, but also those things necessarily incident thereto,[81] such as going to and from the place of employment on the employer's premises.[82]

Inapplicability of employers' liability acts

(1) Where employee was not engaged within scope of his employment at time of his injury, neither the state nor Federal Employers' Liability Act applied.—Fowler v. Western & A. R. R., Ga.App., 42 S.E.2d 499.

(2) For an injured employee to be able to claim a right of action under Federal Employers' Liability Act, it must appear that his injuries were sustained either upon the premises where he normally performed duties of his employment or upon premises so closely adjacent thereto as to be part of the working premises in the sense that employee was required to traverse them in going to or upon leaving his work.—Sassaman v. Pennsylvania R. Co., C.C.A.N.J., 144 F.2d 950.

(3) A train dispatcher, who rode on employer's intrastate train while going home after work and who was injured while alighting from train on station platform some nine miles from normal place of work, was not on employer's premises as a necessary incident to discharge of duties of his employment within contemplation of Federal Employers' Liability Act.—Sassaman v. Pennsylvania R. Co., supra.

b. Measure of Scope

The scope of a servant's duties is to be defined by what he was employed to perform, and by what, with knowledge and approval of his master, he actually did perform.

Test of scope of employment

(1) The test to determine whether the plaintiff was acting within the scope of his employment when he was injured is not to inquire whether he was told in so many words to do the act in question, but whether the defendants ought to have anticipated that such a man might do it.

Injury arising out of, and in course of, employment

(1) The term "arising out of," in respect to an accident arising out of employment, implies some causal relation between employment and injury.—Casey v. Hansen, Iowa, 26 N. W.2d 50.

(2) The term "in the course of," in respect to an accident arising in the course of employment, means during the period of employment and at a place where employee may be performing duties of his employment or doing something incident thereto.—Casey v. Hansen, supra.

(3) An employee does not cease to be in the course of his employment, so as to be precluded from recovering from employer for injuries caused by employer's negligence, merely because he is not engaged in doing some specifically prescribed task, if, in course of his employment, he does some act which he deems necessary for benefit or interest of employer. —Casey v. Hansen, supra.

(4) When an employee is transported to and from his work by the employer, injuries suffered by the employee en route are injuries arising out of and in course of employment.—Lunt v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York, 28 A.2d 736, 139 Me. 218.

(5) Injuries to telegraph messenger when his motorcycle collided with automobile while going to boarding house for flashlight for delivering messages in evening were held not within course of employment.—Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Mason, 22 S.W.2d 602, 232 Ky. 237.

servants were in the habit of exchanging work or assisting each other in their duties, a servant so engaged is held to be within the scope of his employment,[88] and an employee may show that conditions under which his work had been previously performed by him were such as to warrant the inference that the enlargement of the scope of his employment had been acquiesced in so as to include the work being done at the time of an injury,[89] or his presence at the place where the injury occurred.[90] Although generally the servant departs from the ordinary and usual manner of the performance of his duties for his master at his own peril,[91] where there are two ways equally safe and feasible of performing his duty, the employee may adopt one in preference to the other without going beyond the scope of his employment.[92]

c. Emergencies

An employee may be within the scope of his employment when in the presence of an emergency he steps outside the strict bounds of his duty.

Where the circumstances are such as to justify a man of ordinary prudence in regarding the thing as a part of his duty, the servant will be deemed to be acting within the scope of such duty.[93] Thus, when, in the presence of an emergency, an employee steps outside the strict bounds of his duties, he is held to be within the general scope of his employment where such action is taken to preserve or protect the lives of himself or others,[94] or the property of his master,[95] or even where such a course is reasonably called for in order that the master's business may properly proceed,[96] and the right of an employee so to act in an emergency is not affected by the fact that the necessary work is ordinarily done by others under his charge and on whom he had a right to call.[97]

d. Brief Cessations from Work

An employee is not taken outside the scope of his employment by brief cessations from work for a purpose fairly within the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made.

There may be a cessation from work by the servant without loss of the right to recover when such a cessation is for a purpose fairly within the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made.[98] Thus an employee is not taken outside the scope of his employment by a mere pause for rest,[99] to warm himself,[1] to take a drink of water,[2] or to exchange a few words with a fellow servant,[3] and a servant eating lunch near his place of work on the employer's premises is still within his line of duty,[4] but the rule is otherwise where the servant wanders to out-of-the-way or dangerous places on the premises or uses parts thereof for purposes wholly disconnected from, and in no way pertaining to, the business in hand or the objects of his employment.[5]

§ 182. —— Youthful and Inexperienced Servants

In order to make a master liable for personal injuries to youthful and inexperienced servants, the injuries must have been received within the scope of the servant's employment. An employer may assign a minor employee to any employment incident to the employer's work unless prohibited by statute.

The general rule, as discussed supra § 181 a that, in order to make a master liable for personal injuries to his servant, the injuries must have been received within the scope of the servant's employment, applies as well to youthful and inexperienced servants as to adult and experienced employees.[6] An employer hiring a minor under a general contract with the approval of his parent may assign the employee to any character of employment incident to the employer's work unless prohibited from doing so by statute.[7]

§ 183. Care Required of Master

a. In general
b. Under Federal Employers' Liability Act

a. In General

A master is under a duty to exercise ordinary or reasonable care to protect his servant from injury.

While, as discussed supra § 171, a master is not an insurer of his servant's safety, the duty of a master is to exercise due care to protect his servant from injury.[8] The degree of care exacted is that of ordinary[9] or reasonable[10] care; generally no

A master must adopt all reasonable means and precautions to provide for the safety of his employees while they are engaged in his employment.

Drinking water

While employers who undertake to furnish water for employees are bound to take reasonable precaution to see that such water is free from germs and dangerous impurities, where the water is part of a city water supply which is regularly tested it would not ordinarily be necessary for the employer to test the water again before furnishing it to employees although he should see that the means by which it is brought to his employees are kept uncontaminated; but, where water is brought from a well or spring, the exercise of ordinary care would indicate that higher degree of care is required,[11] and a master may be liable although not guilty of gross negligence.[12] In the proper performance of his duties as master, he is bound to exercise care and prudence to prevent his employees from being subjected to unreasonable risks or dangers,[13] and he agrees by implication of law not to subject a servant employed by him to extraordinary or unusual perils.[14] He must exercise reasonable care to eliminate those elements of danger to the servant's life and limb which are not the usual and natural incident of the service when the master has exercised reasonable care,[15] and he must not expose his employees to perils or hazards against which they may be guarded by proper diligence on his part.[16] While under the provisions of a state employers' liability act a much higher degree of care has been required of an employer than is required under the common law[17] and the employer must exercise every care and precaution for the safety of his employees,[18] another state enactment has been held to be declaratory of the common law as to the duties imposed on those coming within its terms.[19] Where a contractee reserves the right to direct the manner of performance of a contract in any particular, he owes an independent contractor thereunder the duty of exercising reasonable care with respect thereto.[20]

Subject to the requirement of the exercise of reasonable care, a master may conduct his business as he chooses,[21] and he is not required to foresee the negligence of his servant and to guard against it,[22] nor is he required to take better care of the servant than the servant may reasonably be expected to take of himself,[23] but a master's liability may be measured by his own knowledge of the actual facts, and not by his knowledge of the servant's ignorance of the facts.[24] The fact that an employer is not financially able to act otherwise does not excuse his negligence.[25]

Under the general rules as to negligence the question of what constitutes reasonable or ordinary care must be determined with regard to the circumstances of the employment,[26] and the standard resorted to is that of the conduct of an ordinarily prudent person under such circumstances[27] and looking at the situation in advance of the accident.[28] While the duty of a master is that of exercising reason-it should be regularly tested before furnished to employees and this is so even though it comes from a well which has been used with apparent immunity by the community for one hundred years.—Union Mining Co. v. Blank, 28 A.2d 568, 181 Md. 62.

able care whether the business is comparatively safe or is extremely dangerous,[29] the degree of care required should be measured by the dangers to be apprehended or avoided.[30] The acts of care and precaution required by ordinary prudence are to be determined as matters of fact from a consideration of the danger incident to the agency employed as well as from other circumstances and conditions,[31] and the precautions required increase with the known dangers.[32]

Extraordinary risks. The fact that a servant is experienced does not relieve the master from the duty to protect him from risks which are not natural and ordinary incidents to the conduct of the business and which could have been removed by the exercise of due diligence.[33] Where the nature of the work is such that the employee cannot by the exercise of ordinary care know of the danger, it is the duty of the employer to take the necessary precautions for the protection of the employee,[34] and the master owes the employee the duty of exercising ordinary care not to create or expose him to new or unanticipated danger.[35]

Emergencies. In the case of an emergency, the employer must act as an ordinarily careful and prudent man would under the same circumstances,[36] and, in case of the immediate peril of an employee, the servants of the master on hand must use such care as might be reasonably expected from such persons.[37] It has been held, however, that in such an emergency, when there is no time for deliberation or thought, negligence cannot be imputed from the fact that a wrong course was pursued in endeavoring to avert injury.[38]

Customs and usages. While the standard of conduct required of an employer for the protection of his employees is prescribed by law and not by custom or practice,[39] and although custom and usage may not be controlling as fixing the standard of care required of an employer with respect to the safety of his employees,[40] custom and usage may be accepted where the custom or practice is not in itself negligent or in disregard of the safety of the employee.[41] In determining the question of negligence, the rules and general practice governing the conduct of those engaged in the particular employment may be considered,[42] and usage is of more import in determining the gauge of care of a master toward his servant than of persons in other relations.[43]

ployment the duty not to hire him if he is physically unfit for the labor he wishes to undertake.[44] Where a servant is aware of his unfitness for a particular work, the master is not negligent in allowing him to continue in the employment when the servant sustains injury therefrom.[45] In order that the employer may be guilty of negligence in allowing the employee to work in a place of peculiar danger to him because of his physical condition, it must be shown not only that the master had knowledge of such physical condition and that the employee was ignorant thereof, but also that the employer did not know of the employee's ignorance.[46] The duty of the master, if any, to protect the servant from dangers arising from the servant's intoxicated condition must be predicated on the fact that the master knew or ought to have known of the servant's condition.[47]

Occupational diseases. The common-law rule of nonliability of a master for injuries to his servant from occupational diseases does not apply to injuries that are preventable by the exercise of reasonable diligence, where the law imposes a duty on the master to use such care to protect the servant from such injuries,[48] and it is just as much the duty of a master to use reasonable care to protect his servants against disease-producing dangers of employment as it is his duty to use reasonable care to protect them against dangers of the employment which produce physical injuries.[49] In determining whether an employer is negligent within the meaning of a state occupational disease act, the test is what a reasonably prudent person would have done under a similar situation, rather than what some other person did or did not do.[50]

Transportation of employee. An employer undertaking to, or under an obligation to, transport his employee to and from work has the duty of exercising reasonable or ordinary care to convey him safely.[51] Where a carrier is transporting one of its employees as an employee and not as a passenger, it has been held to the exercise of reasonable care to avoid his injury,[52] and it has been held that, although he is not, strictly speaking, a passenger, if he is rightfully upon the train, he is entitled to the care required toward passengers.[53]

general rule which defines negligence as the lack of due care under the circumstances,[54] or the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent man ordinarily would have done under the circumstances of the situation,[55] or doing what such a person, under the existing circumstances, would not have done;[56] and a master is liable for injuries attributable to conditions under his control when they are not such as a reasonable man ought to maintain in the circumstances.[57] Under the act the standard of care must be commensurate with the dangers of the business,[58] and the duty of an employer becomes more imperative as the risk increases.[59] However, the act has been held not to subject an employer to that degree of liability imposed by workmen's compensation laws.[60] The negligence of an employer, under the act, may be determined by viewing his conduct as a whole,[61] especially where the elements indicating negligence are closely interwoven and where each imparts character to the others.[62] An employer may rightfully presume that his employee will exercise care for his own safety,[63] and an employer is not negligent because of not guarding against his employee's negligence.[64]

injuring a servant who does some act not within the contractual scope of his employment, but for the master's benefit, although such servant is merely a volunteer.[67]

While it has been held that a master generally owes no duty to a person voluntarily assisting a servant except the duty not wantonly or willfully to injure him,[68] the fact that a person is a volunteer has been held not to deprive him of his right to be protected by the same degree of care which the master owes to other strangers,[69] and it has also been held that a volunteer, assisting or taking the place of a regular employee, is entitled to the exercise of that degree of care owing to persons rightfully upon the employer's premises.[70] It has further been held that reasonable care is required as to a volunteer requested by a servant of the master, with authority to do so, to give his assistance, even though such service is gratuitous,[71] and that a master owes as high a duty to one who accepts without compensation or contract the position of a servant as to an employee.[72] It has been held that a master must exercise ordinary care to protect a person rendering temporary assistance on a servant's request for help to meet an emergency.[73]

§ 185. —— As to Inexperienced or Minor Servants

Ordinarily an employer of minor servants must observe a higher degree of care for their safety than he is required to exercise toward adult servants, and an analogous rule prevails as to inexperienced servants.

The mere fact that a servant is a minor does not necessarily impose on the master any other or greater degree of care with respect to such servant than would be the case if he had attained full age,[74] and a minor employed contrary to the rule of a company is entitled to the ordinary care due from an employer to an employee when he performs services without notice of the rule and has been employed by one authorized to hire him for such purpose.[75] However, the duty of persons who employ minors to anticipate the ordinary behavior of children and to take notice of their lack of judgment must be taken into consideration in the determination of whether due care has been exercised, and to this extent it must be considered to be the duty of the master to exercise greater care for and toward them than is required by law to be exercised toward and for adults.[76] So, where a minor is employed in a business, the danger of which he is unable, by reason of his immature judgment, to comprehend, and is by reason thereof injured, the master has been held liable.[77]

The employment of a minor in a dangerous occupation or place is not negligence per se,[78] or, as it is often stated, no presumption of negligence on the part of the master arises from the mere employment of a child about dangerous work[79] unless, as discussed infra § 194, the employment is in violation of statute. A recovery for injuries sustained by a minor employee is not authorized merely because he is a child.[80]

Misrepresentation of age. The fact that a minor answers falsely as to his age, and secures employment by so doing, in violation of a known rule against employing minors, does not make him a trespasser, or deprive him of his right to the same care for his protection that is due to any other employee, when actually engaged in his employer's service.[81] However, if the minor's age led to the injury, such misrepresentation has been held to relieve the employer of the higher duty which he owes to the minor and the minor is entitled only to the protection given an adult employee.[82]

Consent of parent. While in an action in behalf of the injured minor it has been held that the failure to secure the consent of the parent to the employment of the minor in a dangerous employment is in itself negligence,[83] there is also authority to the contrary,[84] and it has been held merely evidence of negligence.[85] A minor who, without notice of a rule forbidding the employment of minors without the written consent of their parents, performs service for a railway company at the instance of its foreman, is entitled to the care ordinarily due from an employer to an employee.[86]

As to inexperienced servants. An employer of inexperienced servants must observe a higher degree of care for their safety than he is required to exercise toward experienced servants,[87] the rule being analogous to that existing with respect to minors.[88]

§ 186. Delegation of Duties

The performance of the primary or absolute duties required of a master with respect to the safety of his servants may not be so delegated by him as to relieve him from liability for the consequences of the failure properly to discharge them.

The rule as laid down in Corpus Juris, which has been quoted and cited with approval, is that certain primary or absolute duties are imposed by law on a master, such as the provision of a safe place to work, the furnishing of safe and suitable appliances and instrumentalities for work, the employment of a sufficient number of servants, the selection of competent servants, and the establishment of proper rules and methods of work.[89] The performance of such primary or absolute duties may not be so delegated by the master as to relieve him from liability for the consequences of a failure properly to discharge them,[90] but the negligence of one to whom their performance is intrusted by the master is regarded as that of the master, for which he is responsible,[91] even though they are intrusted to a person of approved skill and fitness.[92]

§ 187. Nature and Cause of Injury

a. In general

b. Occupational diseases.

a. In General

A master is liable for injury to a servant occurring in the course of his employment when, and only when, the latter's injury was proximately caused by the master's negligence, and this rule applies under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.

A master is liable for injury to a servant occurring in the course of his employment when, and only when, the latter's injury was proximately caused by the negligence of the master,[93] and where the proximate cause of the employee's injury is his own negligence, and not that of the employer, the employer is not liable therefor.[94] In order to establish proximate cause, it is essential in the first place that there be a causal connection between the negligent act and the injury,[95] and there can be no recovery where the cause of injury is purely conjectural.[96] Where several alleged acts of negligence concur, the master is not liable unless some one of them for which he is responsible is the efficient cause of the injury.[97]

Where the flow of events set in motion by the negligent act of the employer is broken by any new or independent cause the employer's negligence has been held not to be the proximate cause of the injury.[98] Thus, where the negligence complained of merely furnished a condition by which the injury was possible and a subsequent independent act caused the injury, the condition ordinarily is not the proximate cause of the injury.[99] So too, where the evidence does not show which of several possible causes, some of which do not involve negligence on the part of the master, produced the injury, the master has been held not liable.[1] However, where the master's negligence is the efficient cause of the injury, he is liable, although events of causative influence, or constituting a co-operative cause, may intervene between the negligence of the master and the final result,[2] and, where an employer is guilty of negligence without which an accident would not have happened, the fact that it would not have happened except for another intervening cause which was an act of God does not relieve the employer.[3] The fact that the injury might have occurred in the same manner in the absence of negligence on the part of a master does not relieve the master of liability therefor where it was in fact caused by his negligence.[4]

Under Federal Employers' Liability Act. Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act an employer is liable for injury or death of an employee when, and only when, the injury or death was proximately caused by the employer's negligence.[5] An employer's liability for injury to his employee is predicated on a causal connection between the negligence of the employer and the injury sustained by the employee.[6] However, the act has enlarged the field of proximate cause so that where, and only where, injury or death of an employee is the result, in whole or in part, of his employer's negligence, the employer is liable therefor, even though there be a plurality of causes,[7] and an employer has been held liable for injury or death of an employee, where the negligence of the employer, although not the sole cause thereof, contributed thereto proximately as a substantial factor of causation.[8] However, an employer is not liable for an injury to his employee in the course of his employment where there was a direct, independent, and efficient intervening cause between the employer's negligence and the employee's injury.[9] In order to constitute an injury under the act, it need not occur on one specific date or result from one specific incident.[10]

b. Occupational Diseases

Ordinarily at common law an employer is not liable for injury to his servant caused by an occupational disease contracted in the course of his employment as an incident thereto unless the negligence of the employer is the cause of the employee's disease.

Proximate or legal cause

To hold an employer liable for injuries or death of his employee, the negligence of the employer must have been the proximate or legal cause of such injuries or death.—Haggard v. Lowden, 134 P.2d 676, 156 Kan. 522.

Mere remote negligence of an employer does not render him liable for injuries to his employee.—Detroit & T. Shore Line R. Co. v. Seigel, Ohio App., 153 N.E. 870.

Accidental nature of injury

The fact that an employee's injury is not an accidental one has been held to be immaterial under the act, where it is the result, in whole or in part, of negligence on the part of the employer.—Bayer v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 220 N.W. 459, 53 S.D. 116.

10. Tex.—Kansas City Southern Ry. Co. v. Chandler, Civ.App., 192 S.W.2d 304, refused no reversible error.

Repeated traumas

If an injury to an employee is caused by repeated traumas proximately resulting from the negligence of the employer, the fact that the injury was caused by repeated traumas rather than one specific injury does not preclude liability therefor on the part of the employer.—Kansas City Southern Ry. Co. v. Chandler, supra.

Tex.—Gordon v. Travelers' Ins. Co., Civ.App., 287 S.W. 911.

Extrahazardous work

An employer is not liable for injury or death of his employee from disease contracted in the course of his employment on the ground of the extrahazardous nature of the work, since the liability of the employer must arise out of the employer's negligence, and not out of the inherent nature of the work.—

employer is the cause of the employee's disease.[12] Also the disease must be the proximate result of the employer's negligence[13] and an employer is not liable for injury to his employee from any occupational disease not the proximate result of the employer's negligence.[14] The fact that fellow employees did not contract the disease has been held not to indicate conclusively that the working conditions were not the cause of the injury.[15]

Occupational disease within rule. It has been held that an "occupational disease" is one which is a natural incident of a particular occupation and must attach to that occupation a hazard which distinguishes it from the usual run of occupations and which is in excess of that attending employment in general.[16] It has further been held, as affecting the employer's liability for injury to his employee from occupational disease, that there is no basis for distinction between a "true occupational disease," and an "ordinary occupational disease."[17] The word "injury" in a state employers' liability law has been held to be a generic term of broad designation and it may apply to a disability to an employee from an occupational disease[18] so that under such an act an employer may be liable to his employee for an injury from an occupational disease.[19]

§ 188. —— Accidental or Improbable Injury

No liability for negligence attaches to a master when, in the prosecution of a lawful act, injury to his servant is caused by a pure accident; nor is a master negligent merely because he fails to make provision against an accident which he could not reasonably be expected to foresee.

No liability for negligence attaches to a master when, in the prosecution of a lawful act, injury to his servant is caused by a pure accident; nor can a master be said to be negligent merely because he fails to make provision against an accident which he could not reasonably be expected to foresee.[20]

Christopher's Adm'r v. Blanton Stone Co., 80 S.W.2d 590, 258 Ky. 587.

Compliance with compensation provisions

Where it is finally adjudicated by an industrial commission that a particular occupational disease is not compensable, and the injury is not one for which an action at law may be maintained, an employer is not liable therefor under constitutional and statutory provisions that employers complying with compensation provisions shall not be responsible at common law.—Ewers v. Buckeye Clay Pot Co., 163 N.E. 577, 29 Ohio App. 396.

Unknown at common law

An "occupational disease" was unknown at the common law but an employee had a right of action for a disease arising from his employment through the negligence of his employer.—Steiner v. Spencer, 145 S.W.2d 547, 24 Tenn.App. 389.

14. Ind.—Dean v. Dalton Foundries, supra.

General negligence

Under some statutory provisions it has been held that an employer is not liable to his employee, on the ground of general negligence, for injury from an occupational disease contracted by the latter in the course of his employment.—Grutzius v. Armour & Co. of Delaware, 38 N.E.2d 773, 312 Ill.App. 366.

(1) Silicosis is a disease resulting from the inhalation of silica dust and bronchitis resulting from the inhalation of silica dust is a form of silicosis, and bronchitis contracted in employment by inhalation of silica dust is occupational disease with respect to employee's right to recover damages.—Wurst v. American Car & Foundry Co., Mo.App., 103 S.W.2d 6.

(2) Pulmonary tuberculosis has been held to be within an occupational diseases act.—Jannusch v. Weber Bros. Metal Works, 249 Ill. App. 1.

(3) Echinococcosis contracted by beef washer employed in packing plant for which he sought to recover from his employer under the common law, has been held not an occupational disease incident to the employment.—Russo v. Swift & Co., 286 N.W. 291, 136 Neb. 406.

17. Ind.—Dean v. Dalton Foundries, 34 N.E.2d 145, 109 Ind.App. 377.

Time element

As affecting employer's liability, there is no basis for distinction between true occupational disease such as silicosis, which affects employee drop by drop, little by little, day by day, for weeks and months, until finally enough is accumulated to produce symptoms, and ordinary occupational disease such as benzol poisoning, which results more quickly from less prolonged and continuous exposure.—Dean v. Dalton Foundries, supra.

Hidden or improbable dangers see infra § 246.
Improper or unusual use or test see infra § 251.

A master is not compelled to foresee and guard against an accident which reasonable and prudent men would not expect to happen, and, where an injury to a servant could not reasonably have been anticipated, a failure to take precautionary measures is not negligence on the part of the master for which he is liable to the servant.[21] However, where the facts are such that the consequences attributable to the negligence of a master are within the field of reasonable anticipation, he is liable for an injury received by a servant in consequence thereof.[22] Thus, while an employer is not negligent in failing to protect his employee from the possibility of contracting an occupational disease, where such possibility is not probable,[23] he must protect his servant against dangers of employment which may reasonably be expected to produce disease.[24]

It is not necessary to make a master liable for a negligent omission or act that he should have contemplated or should have been able to anticipate the particular consequences, the form of the accident, or the nature of the injury,[25] and, where the act or omission of the master threatened danger, the fact that the accident itself was unusual, extraordinary, or even unheard of does not relieve him from liability.[26] Thus a master whose negligent act results in an injury to his servant is liable therefor although the consequences of the act prove more injurious than would ordinarily be anticipated,[27] and if the full consequences attributable to the negligent act are the natural and probable result thereof the master may be liable although the consequences may not have been specifically contemplated.[28]

A master is not liable for a loss or injury to a servant which is due to an act of God, that is, when it is occasioned exclusively by natural causes such as could not have been prevented by human care and foresight,[29] but if there is any contributing negligence to cause the damage on the part of the employer he will not be excused by reason of such causes.[30] Thus, although an injury resulted from an unusual or extraordinary storm or wind, the employer is not relieved from liability when such a natural force could have been anticipated.[31] However, it has been held, where an employee is injured or dies as a result of an unanticipated and unusual windstorm, that the employer is not liable therefor.[32]

Operation of railroads. A railroad is not liable for an injury to an employee resulting from pure accident[33] or from causes which could not have been reasonably anticipated,[34] and a railroad is not liable where the injury to the servant is not the natural and probable consequence of its negligence.[35] Where, however, in the exercise of reasonable care it might have foreseen that some injury would result from its act or omission, or might have anticipated consequences of a generally injurious nature, it will be liable for injuries resulting from such act or omission[36] although the particular consequences might not have been anticipated.[37]

§ 189. —— Acts or Omissions of Third Persons

Ordinarily a master is not liable for injuries to his servant caused by the acts or omissions of third persons over whom he has no control.

A master is not, as a general rule, liable for injuries to his servant caused by the acts or omissions of third persons over whom he has no control.[38] This is true notwithstanding at the time of the injury the employee was acting in a manner provided for by the rules of the employer.[39] Thus ordinarily an employer is not liable for injury to an employee caused by trespassers[40] or by thieves or robbers.[41] Similarly an employer usually has no duty to protect his employee from mob violence or assault by strikers[42] or by hoboes,[43] and ordinarily the employer is not liable to his employee for injury from such sources even where the injury inflicted on the employee by the hoboes or strikers was with the connivance of his fellow employees, in the absence of notice on the part of the employer of the hostility of such fellow employees.[44]

A master is liable to his servant for injuries sustained by the latter where the master's negligence contributed to the injury, even though there was concurring negligence on the part of a third person,[45] where the injury would not have occurred but for the master's negligence.[46] The concurrent or succeeding negligence of a third person which does not break the sequence of events is not an independent intervening cause and does not relieve the master of liability for the original wrongdoing although in the absence of such concurrent or succeeding negligence the accident would not have occurred and the servant would not have sustained the injury.[47] However, where the flow of events set in motion by the alleged negligent act of the employer is broken by any new or independent act on the part of a third person resulting in injury to an employee, the employer is not liable therefor.[48]

Where an employee is injured by the negligence of a third person for whom he is performing services at the instance of his employer and within the scope of his employment, the master is not relieved from liability for injuries so received;[49] and this is particularly so when such an employee has been assigned, without warning of danger, to assist a third person in work of a hazardous nature.[50] Ordinarily a servant may not delegate his duties to a substituted servant so as to make the master liable for the acts of such substituted servant resulting in injury to another servant.[51]

§ 190. —— Acts or Omissions of Persons Compulsorily Employed

A master has been held not liable to his servant for injury to the latter caused by one compulsorily employed by the master, but there is also authority to the contrary.

There is a conflict of authority as to whether a master is responsible to his servants for the acts of one compulsorily employed under statutes which have been enacted in some jurisdictions to secure the safety of workmen in certain hazardous industries, particularly mining, requiring that a master employ licensed foremen or superintendents.[52] According to one view, a statutory mine foreman is to be regarded as a fellow servant of the miners, and the mine owner may defend on that ground in an action brought against him for an injury received through the negligence of the foreman.[53] On the other hand, a compulsory mine foreman has been regarded as a vice principal[54] for whose negligence the mine owner is liable regardless of the good faith of the foreman[55] or his willful failure to perform his statutory duties,[56] although in the performance of duties not imposed on him by statute the foreman is held not a vice principal, but is regarded as a servant of the operator and a fellow servant of the miners.[57]

In a jurisdiction in which the rule that the mine foreman is a fellow servant has been recognized, the view has also been taken that the foreman is a state official over whose acts the mine owner has no control and for which he is not liable,[58] and it has also been held that he is not such a servant of the mine owner as to be within the contemplation of an employers' liability act.[59] The master has been held not liable for the negligence of a mine foreman on the theory that the relation of master and servant does not exist as between the foreman and the owner,[60] and the situation has been held analogous to that existing where a vessel is in the hands of a compulsory pilot.[61]

Nevertheless a mine owner may be liable for the negligence of the mine foreman, regardless of his legal status, when, with knowledge of improper conditions, the owner allows them to persist.[62] He may also be liable when there has not been full compliance with the statute compelling the employment of a qualified mine foreman[63] or when the foreman is engaged in the performance of duties outside those prescribed by statute.[64] In any case the compulsory employment of a mine foreman does not relieve the mine owner of responsibility for nondelegable master's duties.[65]

Under a statute making it unlawful for anyone to act in certain capacities in mines, including a fire boss, without having obtained a certificate of competency, an employer selecting a fire boss who holds such certificate has been held not liable for injuries to an employee where the charge is the general incompetency of the fire boss not connected with his particular acts with relation to the injury of the employee.[66]

A statutory provision imposing liability on the mine owner for negligence of the foreman has been held invalid,[67] but there is also authority sustaining the validity of a like statute.[68]

§ 191. —— Violation of Statutes

Ordinarily a master's violation of a statute intended to protect the life, health, and safety of employees constitutes actionable negligence, but such negligence must be shown to be the proximate cause of the injury to the servant.

Duties not implied
Statutory duties of an employer to protect his employees do not arise by implication but must be imposed by express legislative authority and must be clearly set forth.—Prattico v. Hudson Coal Co., 32 A.2d 733, 347 Pa. 490.

Negligence as matter of law

(2) Where statute provided that drivers of trucks should come to complete stop and look for approaching trains before crossing railroad tracks, and trucking concern specifically instructed truck driver to obey all traffic laws, and truck driver made no attempt to stop at grade crossing where collision with train occurred, truck driver was negligent as a matter of law.—Cohen v. Schaetzel, 103 P.2d 1060, 106 Colo. 266.

Negligence is implied from the failure of an employer to comply with the requirements of such statutory enactments.—Ford v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 54 F. 2d 342, certiorari denied 52 S.Ct. 405, 285 U.S. 549, 76 L.Ed. 939.

Effect of general negligence
Under a workmen's occupational disease act the word "negligence" has been held not to mean general or ordinary negligence, in view of a proviso that an employer's violation of a statute intended for an employee's health or violation of rules of a commission pursuant to a health and safety act should constitute negligence within the meaning of the provision, so that the failure of the legislature to enact a statute for the protection of the health has been held that the failure of an employer to comply with such a statute constitutes negligence per se[70] when one of the protected class is injured from a cause against which the statute is designed to protect him.[71] While a violation of the statutes usually is a sufficient showing of negligence, the negligence must be shown to be the proximate cause of the injury.[72]

While a statute relating to the health and safety of employees which is regulatory and penal has been held not to indicate a legislative intent to make an employer absolutely liable to his employees for injuries caused by the employer's failure to comply with the requirements thereof,[73] it has also been held that, although an act does not, in so many words, authorize the bringing of a civil action for damages because of its violation, the violation of the duties thereby imposed on employers constitutes negligence[74] without regard to the applicability or nonapplicability of the penal clause of such a statute.[75] The fact that a penalty is attached for a violation of a statute, or that a violation is made a crime, has been held not to preclude a person injured by reason of the violation from bringing an action to recover damages for injuries which he sustained[76] unless the penalty imposed is given to the person injured.[77]

§ 192. —— Willful Injury

Where a servant is injured by reason of the willful negligence of the master, the latter is liable therefor.

Where a servant is injured by reason of the willful negligence of the master, the latter is liable therefor.[78] A direct intent is not necessary to establish willfulness,[79] but a mere failure to use ordinary care will not constitute willful or wanton negligence.[80] Where a statute gives a right of action to an employee for a willful violation thereof[81] it is sufficient to show any conscious acts or omission, irrespective of evil intent,[82] provided the act or omission charged to be willful is an act or omission prohibited by the statute.[83] The omission of employees since the adoption of the workmen's occupational diseases act and failure of the commission to promulgate rules for the protection of the health of employees pursuant to a health and safety act, precluded the employee from recovering damages for injury to health suffered as a result of the employer's general negligence.—Grutzius v. Armour & Co. of Delaware, 38 N.E.2d 773, 312 Ill.App. 366.

Federal Employers' Liability Act

(1) It has been held that the violation of a state statute imposing a duty on an employer for the benefit of its employees is actionable negligence even though the employer is subject to the provisions of the Federal Employers' Liability Act. —Luton Mining Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 123 S.W.2d 1055, 276 Ky. 321.

(2) However, it has also been held that, in a suit brought under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the violation of a state statute or of a town or city ordinance does not constitute negligence per se on the part of an employer.—Moore v. Southern Ry. Co., 161 S.E. 525, 163 S.C. 342, reversed on other grounds Southern Ry. Co. v. Moore, 52 S.Ct. 38, 284 U.S. 581, 76 L.Ed. 503.

Construction of statute

A statute designed to protect a particular class of servants against a particular class of injuries should be reasonably construed with reference to its apparent purpose and to those considerations which address themselves to the plain and observant minds of those persons whose conduct is to be governed by it.—Lockhart v. Under state employers' liability act, proximate cause of an injury is not meant the last act of cause or nearest act to the injury, but such act of commission or omission violating or failing to comply with provisions of the act as actually aided in producing the injury as a direct and existing cause, and it need not be the sole cause, but it must be a concurring cause such as might reasonably have been contemplated as involving the result under the attending circumstances.—Ludwig v. must be more than a mere inadvertence or a failure to use ordinary care,[84] but if it is a conscious omission the good faith of the employer with respect to the observance of the statutory requirements is immaterial.[85]

In some states, in order to authorize a verdict in a suit against a railroad company for the death of an employee, it is necessary to show that the life of the deceased was lost by the willful neglect of defendant or his agents or servants.[86] However, it has been held that the maintenance by a railroad of a bridge over its tracks at such a height that a brakeman cannot perform his duties with reasonable safety constitutes willful negligence.[87]

§ 193. Injury in Unlawful Act or Employment

A master is not liable to a servant for an injury received by the latter in the voluntary performance of an unlawful act.

Where a servant is injured in the voluntary performance of an unlawful act, he cannot recover therefor as against his master,[88] as, for example, where the act is a violation of a statute intended for the protection of both the employee and the public.[89] The fact that the act in which the employee was injured was unlawful on the part of his employer does not give him a right to recover as against the employer where the unlawful character of the act did not contribute to his injury.[90]

a. In General

With respect to the liability of an employer to a minor employee injured in the course of his employment, a child labor statute should be liberally construed.

With respect to the liability of an employer for injury to a minor employee, child labor statutes should be liberally construed[91] to accomplish their objects,[92] and the law should be rendered intelligible and absurdities avoided.[93] The words used should be given their ordinary and usual meaning.[94] In accordance with these rules and those relating to the construction of statutes generally, numerous statutory provisions have been construed and applied to determine what constitutes an employment of a minor in violation of law,[95] such as what constitutes dangerous, hazardous, extrahazardous, or especially hazardous work or employment,[96] as well

The facts of a particular case control as to whether a minor's employ-

as what constitutes a violation of a statute forbidding the employment of a minor in certain places,[97] or forbidding the employment of a minor to operate or assist in operating certain machinery.[98] Under some statutory provisions, minors of a certain age group may, subject to certain conditions, be lawfully employed in occupations or establishments not forbidden as hazardous,[99] but statutory prohibitions or regulations concerning the employment of children of one age group in specified occupations or places have no application to children of another age group.[1]

The question whether a child labor statute repeals an earlier one depends on whether the later act, although it contains no words to that effect, must, in the principles of law, as well as in reason and common sense, operate to repeal the former,[2] and a repeal of such statute is implied where the later statute covers the whole of the field covered by the earlier statute.[3]

b. Right or Cause of Action

Ordinarily, an employer's violation of a child labor statute gives rise to a right or cause of action for any injury of which it is the proximate cause in favor of a plaintiff for whose benefit the statute was enacted, although the statute provides no special remedy.

By statute in many jurisdictions, the employment of children of less than specified ages is either entirely prohibited or prohibited with respect to particular unsuitable or hazardous employments, or is made the subject of specific regulations, and, in accordance with the general rules by which a finding of negligence may be predicated on a violation of a duty imposed by statute, the violation of such a statute by a master ordinarily is negligence per se,[4] or prima facie evidence of negligence,[5] giving rise to a right or cause of action,[6] for any injury of

Test of "occupation especially hazardous to life and limb"

Question whether child is employed in "occupation especially hazardous to life and limb" depends on whether employment considering inevitable strain on child renders occupation dangerous.—Employers' Casualty Co. v. Underwood, 286 P. 7, 142 Okl. 208.

An employment is dangerous within a statute prohibiting the employment of children under a given age in certain employments whenever there is reasonable cause to anticipate injury to a person engaged in it, whether the risk comes from the inherent character of the work, or whether it comes from the manner in which the work is done.—Harvey v. Ruff, 204 N.W. 634, 164 Minn. 21.

which it is the proximate cause,[7] in favor of a plaintiff for whose benefit the statute was enacted,[8] although the statute provides no special remedy.[9] Thus, although the violation of a statute may be made a crime, and the statute is merely penal, containing no provisions for a civil action, nevertheless the employer may be liable in a civil action for injuries to the minor wrongfully employed.[10] However, a statute imposing a penalty to be recovered by the party injured in satisfaction for the injury may be so worded as to be exclusive of other remedies.[11] The rule has been applied to numerous statutes prohibiting or regulating the employment of minors,[12] such as statutes prohibiting or regulating the employment of minors under specified ages,[13] the employment of minors in specified occupations or places,[14] the employment of minors for more than a specified number of hours,[15] and the employment of minors without an employment certificate.[16]

Although the violation of such a statute may be held to be negligence per se, there must be a causal relation between the act and the injury to render the master liable.[17] Where a minor sustains injuries in the course of his duty, the unlawful employment may be regarded as in itself the proximate cause of injury,[18] unless other negligence intervenes,[19] but the employer is not, as matter of law, chargeable with all injuries that result during the unlawful employment.[20] He is liable only for those injuries against which the statute is intended to guard,[21] or for injuries that naturally and probably,[22] or reasonably and naturally,[23] follow the statute's violation.

Although the violation of law furnished merely the occasion for the injury and was not technically its proximate cause, it has been held that, where an infant is injured through the occurrence of one of the dangers against which child labor statutes are designed to protect him, the employer is liable therefor.[24] It has further been held that it is not necessary in order to charge a master that the child be engaged in the duties for which he is employed,[25] but that, when the statute prohibits only the hiring for a particular kind of work, the fact that one under the prescribed age was injured when employed in such work will not render the master liable when such work was without the scope of employment.[26]

Relationship of parties. Under some statutory provisions, the existence of the technical relation of master and servant is not a prerequisite to recovery.[27] However, in order that liability may attach to one under a statute dealing with the employment of minors, he must have retained such supervision and control that he could have prevented the unlawful employment.[28] Knowledge on the part of the employer that the services were performed by the infant has been held necessary to render him liable for injury to the infant,[29] but, where a minor is knowingly permitted or directed to work as an employee and that permission or direction is given by a foreman who has supervision of the work, the statute is violated,[30] although minors sometimes voluntarily assisting and performing personal services for an employee have been held not employed or permitted to work by the master so as to render him liable for injury to them.[31] Under some statutory provisions, knowingly permitting a minor to work near unguarded gearing constitutes a violation of law.[32]

cerning the employment of minors, it is open to the employer to show that the circumstances of the employment did not fall within the purview of the statute.[33] The employment of a minor under a specified age may be declared unlawful, but, if at the time of his injury that child has attained the minimum age sanctioned by statute, the employer is not liable.[34] Under a statute prohibiting employment of a minor in an occupation dangerous to life or limb, the employer has been held not liable for something done without his authority.[35] However, the fact that a child was only temporarily employed and not on the regular pay roll,[36] that he had not taken up his tasks on the morning of the injury,[37] that he was given full instructions,[38] that the employer had no knowledge of the dangerous character of the employment or place,[39] or that the minor was attending night school,[40] is not available as a defense to the employer when sued for damages for an injury received by the minor while employed contrary to statutory prohibition.

The failure of other employers, in a like situation, to obtain employment certificates,[41] or the fact that the employer was innocent or ignorant of the minor's age because of the child's physique or mentality,[42] or that the minor has the physical qualifications to do the work,[43] has been held no defense. However, the employment has been held not unlawful where the employer in good faith procured and relied on a welfare officer's certificate authorizing employment of the minor.[44]

Since child labor statutes are aimed at the employer,[45] it is no defense that the child by accepting employment violated the statute.[46] Also, it is no defense to the child's right of action that the parent acquiesced in the unlawful employment.[47] While in some jurisdictions the rule obtains that the employment of a minor in good faith after the exercise of proper vigilance to ascertain his age does not relieve the master from the operation of the statute,[48] in other jurisdictions it is a defense that the employer has exercised proper vigilance and is justified in his belief that the employee is of sufficient age to authorize his employment,[49] and it has been held that an employer may show that his act in employing the injured minor was not a willful and known violation of the statute.[50] Where the employer has recognized the employment, it is no defense that the employment manager, having complete authority, entered an employee's age as being older than he actually was, with the employee's knowledge.[51]

guardian,[53] or his friend,[54] is no defense to an employer, when sued by a child who is injured while unlawfully employed, unless allowed by statute.[55] The defense is also properly denied an employer where a parental affidavit of age,[56] employment certificate,[57] or other record,[58] required by statutes, is not furnished.

§ 195. Joint and Several Liability

Ordinarily, where a servant is injured by reason of the concurrent negligence of the employer and others, they are jointly and severally liable, provided there is a community of interest of wrong or fault.

Ordinarily, where a servant is injured by reason of the concurrent negligence of the employer and others, they are jointly and severally liable,[59] provided there is a community of purpose or of wrong or fault.[60] It has been held that, where the original owner of a business and a purchaser thereof are jointly responsible for an injury to an employee, they are severally liable therefor.[61] Where a master delegates his duty to protect his servant to another and the servant is injured by reason of such person's negligence, they have been held jointly liable therefor.[62] However, the violation of a statute placing a duty on an "owner or person in charge" of an institution to protect an employee does not render an owner and person in charge of such institution jointly liable to a servant injured by the failure to comply with the provisions of the statute.[63]

The rule of joint and several liability where there is a community of purpose or of wrong or fault applies to employees of railroads,[64] or of other employers,[65] who are injured through the joint negligence of their employers and others, as, for example, in the case of the concurring negligence of railroads operating under joint traffic agreements.[66] The fact that the employee is acting outside of the scope of his employment at the time of the injury is not a defense to a third person guilty of negligence toward him.[67]

§ 196. Express Contracts Affecting Master's Liability

The validity, form, and sufficiency of express contracts affecting the master's liability for injury to his servant are discussed infra § 197, what law governs such contract, infra § 199, waiver of contract against liability, infra § 200, and the effect of acceptance of benefits from relief or benefit department or association, supra § 170.

a. In General

While, in the absence of constitutional or statutory prohibition, it has been held that a contract exempting an employer from liability for future injury to his employee resulting from the employer's negligence or breach of duty is valid, it has also been held that such a contract is invalid as against public policy.

While, in the absence of constitutional or statutory prohibition, it has been held that a contract exempting an employer from liability for future injury to his employee resulting from the employer's negligence or breach of duty is valid,[68] and the supreme court of the United States has given at least partial assent to this rule,[69] it has also been held that a contract, in so far as it attempts to accomplish such result, is invalid[70] as against public policy.[71] It has further been held that a master, under the guise of an adoption of rules and regulations, may not relieve himself from liability to his servant for negligence.[72] An express agreement by which an employee assumes risks which he would in the absence of agreement assume by implication is not, however, invalid;[73] and it is competent for an employee to waive the advantage of any provision of law which was intended solely for his benefit, so long as the waiver does not violate public policy.[74]

Form and sufficiency. Assuming that an agreement for the release of an employer from liability for injury to his employee may be regarded as valid, in order to prevail as a defense it must be plainly expressed in the contract of employment,[75] and must be supported by a consideration.[76] In the absence of fraud or imposition the contract is not invalidated by the fact that the employee signs it without reading or understanding it.[77]

Contracts for benefit of employee. An employer may contract to assume risks ordinarily assumed by an employee.[78] Where, as a part of the contract of employment, an employer agrees to protect his employee against violence by strikers or strike sympathizers the employee may recover damages resulting to him from a breach of such agreement.[79] An agreement of this character, although agreeing to furnish absolute protection from violence, is not invalid as impossible of performance,[80] or as against public policy as necessitating the employment of a private armed force,[81] or as a contract of insurance not complying with the requirements of the laws as to contracts of insurance.[82]

Past injuries. An employee, failing, without his employer's fault, to read a written release of the employer from further liability for injuries to the employee in consideration of the payment of a stated sum, has been held bound by its terms.[83]

b. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

Under some constitutional and statutory provisions, a contract, in so far as it attempts to relieve or exempt a master from liability for future injury to his servant resulting from the master's negligence or breach of duty, is invalid.

Under some constitutional and statutory provisions, a contract, in so far as it attempts to relieve or exempt a master from liability for future injury to his servant resulting from the master's negligence or breach of duty, is invalid,[84] as where the liability contracted against is one imposed by statute.[85] The validity of such statutes has been sustained,[86] and they may not be evaded by indirection.[87] They are, however, construed to apply only to contracts clearly within their provisions,[88] and have been held not to invalidate releases executed after an injury has been sustained.[89]

Contract held not within prohibition

A statute prohibiting contracts between a master and servant releasing the master from liability for injury to the servant resulting from the master's negligence is not contravened by an application for employment by which the servant undertakes to make a careful examination of all things near to the railroad tracks, so that he may understand the dangers attending them.—Quinn v. Ohio.—Bowers v. Detroit Southern R., 26 Ohio Cir.Ct. 518.

Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, any contract, the purpose of which is to enable a common carrier by railroad to exempt itself from any liability created by the act, is to that extent void.[90] This provision has been sustained as against an objection that it interferes with the liberty of contract guaranteed by the federal constitution.[91] It applies to existing, as well as to future, contracts and regulations of the proscribed character.[92] It applies, however, only to liabilities created by the act.[93] It does not apply to a contract between a railroad company and an independent contractor,[94] or to a contract between an express company and its messengers,[95] or between a Pullman car company and its employee,[96] although it applies to a contract with a porter employed by a railroad and a Pullman company jointly.[97] Also it does not apply to agreements for settlements or releases entered into after an injury has been sustained.[98]

§ 198. —— What Law Governs

The law of the state where the injury to a servant occurs has been held to govern whether a contract attempting to release a master from liability for injury to his servant will be enforced.

Although the courts of the state in which a contract of employment is made may regard a contract attempting to release the employer from liability for injury to an employee as against public policy, they will enforce it as to an injury occurring in a state wherein such a contract is recognized as valid.[99] Where a contract of employment contemplates that a portion of the services is to be performed in another state wherein the injury complained of is received and wherein a contract releasing the employer from liability is void, the courts of the state wherein the contract is made will regard it as void as governed by the law of the state of the injury.[1] It has been held that no contract made in one state purporting to release an employer from liability to his employee for future negligence will be enforced in another state, where an injury is sustained by the employee in the latter state, if such contract violates the public policy of such state.[2]

§ 199. —— Construction

A contract by an employee releasing an employer from liability for injury to the employee should be strictly construed. The fact that a master agrees to take all risk of any accident which may occur to a servant does not impose on the master a liability for injuries caused by the servant's contributory negligence.

A contract by an employee releasing the employer from liability for injury to the employee is to be strictly construed.[3] General words are limited by a

What constitutes "liability" under act
The liableness to a judicial pronouncement of liability in any of the courts enumerated in venue provision of the Federal Employers' Liability Act is itself a "liability" within other provision of the act invalidating a contract by which such common carrier exempts itself from liability, so that a provision in contract between injured employee and carrier by which employee agreed not to maintain suit in any other court than the federal district court for a specified district was invalid under provision in the Employers' Liability Act invalidating any contract by which a common carrier exempts itself from liability created by the act.—Petersen v. Ogden Union Ry. & Depot Co., supra.

Contract to keep rolling stock in repair
A contract whereby another company agrees to keep a railroad's rolling stock in repair has been held to be void to the extent that its purpose or intent is to enable the railroad to exempt itself from any liability created by the Federal Employers' Liability Act.—Moore v. by furnishing in the first instance a safe place to work and safe instrumentalities.[17]

The determination of what is safe depends on the particular circumstances.[18] While the servant may assume that the master has performed such duty,[19] the rule is to be applied in harmony with the doctrine of assumed risk,[20] discussed infra §§ 363, 364, and the master may assume that the servant will exercise some care for his own safety.[21] It has been held, however, that the master's duty of furnishing safe appliances is independent of the servant's duty to exercise ordinary care in using the appliances,[22] and the fact that an employee had or might have had sufficient inventive skill and genius to have devised means of self-protection does not absolve the employer of furnishing ordinary safety appliances.[23]

The rule does not apply where the place becomes unsafe during the progress of the work, as discussed infra § 219, or where the servant is engaged in the work of making a dangerous place safe, discussed infra § 250.

Scope of employment. In order to render a master liable for personal injuries to his servant arising out of failure to furnish safe tools, machinery, appliances, and places for work, the injuries must have been received within the scope of the servant's employment.[24]

Appliances furnished by servant. The master is not liable for an injury resulting from a defect in tools, machinery, or appliances furnished by the servant.[25]

§ 202. Degree of Care Required

A master is not an insurer of the safety of the instrumentalities or places for work furnished his servant, but is liable only for negligence or the failure to exercise due, ordinary, or reasonable care.

In furnishing tools, machinery, and appliances for an employee, or a place for his work, an employer must exercise due care.[26] He is not an insurer of the safety of the tools, machinery, appliances, and places for work, nor is he an insurer of the

In determining the liability of the employer as in other cases in which it becomes a question of whether or not due, ordinary, or reasonable care and diligence has been exercised there is no absolute standard to which the conduct of the master must have conformed, but the question is always one to be determined with reference to the facts of the particular case,[32] and regard must be had for the nature and extent of danger of the work,[33]

the place where the work is performed,[34] and the instrumentalities furnished,[35] and the equipment, appliances, and information known to, and available in, the particular industry or work.[36] The test resorted to is what a reasonably prudent person would ordinarily have done in the same situation or under similar circumstances.[37] Although the employer's duty is that of exercising ordinary or reasonable care, whether the work is comparatively safe or is extremely dangerous,[38] his duty becomes more imperative as the risk increases,[39] as do the acts and precautions required by ordinary prudence.[40] While the employer must anticipate and guard against all such dangers as will likely flow from the conditions of the place in which his employees work, and the instrumentalities with which they are provided to work,[41] when used in the usual way they are intended to be used,[42] he is not bound to foresee and provide against every possible danger[43] and can be held liable only for injuries which he should have reasonably foreseen.[44]

Generally it is not the duty of a master to establish and maintain conditions which are safe for every employee;[45] it is enough that the conditions are reasonably safe for the average employee.[46] The fact that dangers may be connected with the general class of work in which the servant is engaged, which the required degree of care of the master could not remove, does not excuse the master from liability for injuries due to dangers which the exercise of the requisite degree of care would remove.[47]

Momentary forgetfulness may in an emergency excuse negligence on the part of a servant, as discussed infra § 436, but it does not create liability

where the master has exercised the required degree of care for the servant's safety.[48]

Rule as affected by statute. Unless the statute imposes an absolute duty on the part of the employer or in terms sets up a different measure of care,[49] under the various statutes regulating the matter the master is not a guarantor or insurer of the servant's safety,[50] but the common-law rule requiring a master only to use ordinary or reasonable care will be held to apply.[51]

§ 203. —— Care Required Dependent on Knowledge and Experience of Servant

Whether the master has exercised reasonable care in furnishing his servant reasonably safe instrumentalities and a place for work depends in some degree on the experience, maturity, intelligence, and discretion of the servant.

While the duty of the master to provide his servants with a reasonably safe place in which to work is owed alike to the young and the old,[52] the skilled and the unskilled,[53] whether the master has exercised ordinary or reasonable care in furnishing his servant reasonably safe instrumentalities and a place for work depends in some degree on the experience, maturity, intelligence, and discretion of the servant employed,[54] and in the case of youthful employees he must exercise a degree of care which has regard for their youth and inexperience.[55] Where, however, the master has furnished a suitable place to work and suitable appliances, if the servant is mature and sensible and has had some experience in the work being done he must look after himself as to all obvious dangers in the de-

Care required of master generally as to inexperienced or minor servants see supra § 185.

Mentally deficient servant
The master's duty of due care, to give special protection to a servant mentally deficient, arises from latter's failure, without fault, to appreciate dangers ordinarily obvious.—Dziedzie v. Newmarket Mfg. Co., 129 A. 271, 81 N.H. 516—Smith v. American Woolen Co., 92 A. 334, 77 N.H. 391.

Where employee was an epileptic, employer's knowledge of his disease was a circumstance in light of which employer's conduct in furnishing a place for him to work was to be judged, but employer owed employee no duty of special protection except as related to an attack.—Monteith v. Manchester Rendering Co., 131 A. 440, 82 N.H. 175.

Lineman not inexperienced
One employed by electric company as a lineman for one year and three months was not entitled to special protection against risks incident to his employment on ground of inexperience.—Fortier v. Concord Electric Co., 33 A.2d 801, 92 N.H. 492.

tails of the work.[56] Further, the master cannot be held liable for failure to furnish a safe place to work if the danger is so obvious and is before the servant's eyes to such extent that he must know, by the use of ordinary intelligence, the danger that confronts him,[57] nor can the master be held liable for failure to furnish the servant with safe tools where the servant has equal knowledge with the master as to the safety thereof,[58] as where the tools furnished are of a simple nature in which defects can be readily observed.[59] A master cannot escape liability, however, where the servant had no knowledge of defective conditions and the danger was not so obvious that he should have observed it,[60] and it has been held that the degree of care which the law requires of a master is greater than that which is required of the servant, and a master may be chargeable with negligence in failing to ascertain a danger where the servant is not so chargeable.[61]

§ 204. Delegation of Duty

a. In general

b. To servant injured

a. In General

The duty to furnish safe tools, machinery, appliances, and places for work is a positive duty resting on the master and cannot be delegated to another so as to relieve the master of his primary liability.

The duty to furnish safe tools, machinery, appliances, and places for work is a positive, affirmative duty resting on the master, and cannot be delegated to another,[62] or, rather, cannot be delegated to an-

or it may be.[66] Since the duty of the master in respect of reasonably safe instrumentalities and places of work is a continuing one, as discussed supra § 201, the duty of inspection, discussed infra § 235, resting on the employer in consequence thereof cannot be delegated so as to relieve him from the consequences of a failure to inspect or of an inadequate inspection.[67]

b. To Servant Injured

As a general rule it is competent for the master to delegate to the servant, and for the servant to accept, the burden of inspection, or under some circumstances the maintenance of the appliances or places he is required to use, so as to relieve the master of liability for injuries to the servant resulting from the servant's failure to perform the duties delegated to him.

In the absence of a statute to the contrary[68] or a paramount contract limiting the master's power,[69] as a general rule, it is competent for the master to delegate to the servant, and for the servant to accept, by contract or mutual understanding, the burden of inspection, examination, or even under some circumstances the maintenance, of the appliances or places he is required to use, so as to relieve the master of liability for injuries to the servant resulting from the servant's failure to perform the duties delegated to him.[70] Thus the master may trust the servant to perform the intermediate, ordinary, and

Superior servants or vice principals intrusted with full control

(1) The rule imposing on a master the nondelegable duty to furnish a reasonably safe place to work and reasonably safe tools and appliances with which to work has no application to a skilled and experienced superior servant or vice principal intrusted by employer with complete control of the work and the method of doing it, and on whom rests the responsibility of advising employer if additional tools, appliances, or helpers are necessary for safe performance of work, in absence of advice by vice principal that such are needed and a request that they be furnished.—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Kennard, Okl., 181 P.2d 234—City of Edmond v. Washam, 121 P.2d 300, 190 Okl. 140.

(2) An employee of a construction company engaged in construction of a pipe line tunnel under tracks of a railroad who was in charge of crew engaged in this operation with complete supervision of digging tunnel and full control of the men under him, including the right to hire and fire men for such purpose, and who was experienced in such work, was a superior servant or vice principal within the meaning of the rule.—Atchison T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Kennard, supra.

(3) Other persons held to be superior servants or vice principals within the meaning of the rule.—City of Edmond v. Washam, supra.

Servant without authority or competency to make repairs

The rule that the master cannot delegate his duty to furnish safe tools, machinery and appliances cannot be abrogated by intrusting the duty of inspection and repair to a servant with no authority to have the repairs made by some competent workman at the expense of the master, and who is not competent to make the repairs himself, and who has not been employed for the purpose of keeping the instrumentality in repair.—Price v. Taylor, 1 So.2d 784, 191 Miss. 392.

Maintenance and inspection of poles

(1) The duty of maintaining and caring for the poles of the employer does not necessarily include a duty to keep the poles in a safe condition, and hence the acceptance of such duty does not bar the recovery of appropriate damages for an injury suffered by an employee because of the unsafe condition of a pole.—Kirkland v. City of Gainesville, 166 So. 460, 122 Fla. 765.

(2) A lineman's acceptance of a general duty to make such reasonable inspection of each pole he climbed as was necessary or appropriate to discover defects, if any, in the pole that would make it unsafe to climb does not relieve the employer of liability for a defect below the surface of the ground in the absence of a showing that the employee was required to inspect the pole below the surface.—Peninsular Telephone Co. v. Dority, 174 So. 446, 128 Fla. 106.

simple duties incidental to the servant's employment and resting on the servant's knowledge and skill,[71] as, for instance, the keeping of simple tools in repair and making light repairs.[72] Likewise an employer may delegate to the servant the preparation of his own place in which to do his work,[73] and a servant engaged in, or charged with the duty of, making or keeping the place of work safe cannot recover for injuries resulting from his own negligence in this respect.[74] Furthermore the master may delegate to the servant the application of instrumentalities or the erection of structures necessary to carry on his work,[75] and, when the master has exercised reasonable care in furnishing suitable materials or appliances, in sufficient quantities for such purposes, he may intrust to the servant the selection of material or appliances therefrom,[76] and he will be relieved from liability in such case for injuries resulting from the improper use of or failure to use such material or appliances,[77] or from the use of defective materials or appliances,[78] unless all are defective[79] or the defect is one which is known or should be known by the master but cannot be discovered by the inspection which the employee could be expected to make.[80] The mere fact that a servant is to a certain extent directing the work does not, however, lessen the master's duty to provide safe appliances with which to do the work.[81]

Where the work necessarily changes the character of the place or appliances, the duty of care for the safety of the place and appliances has been held to devolve on the servants to whom the work is intrusted.[82]

§ 205. Failure to Furnish Proper and Sufficient Tools or Appliances

It is actionable negligence on the part of a master to fail to furnish, or to fail to exercise ordinary or reasonable care to furnish, his servant with such proper tools and appliances as may be required for the reasonably safe prosecution of the work.

It is actionable negligence on the part of a master to fail to furnish,[83] or to fail to exercise ordinary or reasonable care to furnish,[84] his servant with such proper tools and appliances as may be required for the reasonably safe prosecution of the work, and he cannot escape liability for failing to furnish proper safety appliances because they might not have been effectual or might not have been used even if at hand.[85] In order to make a master liable for failure to furnish proper tools and appliances, however, it must be shown that such tools and appliances were necessary[86] and that none was at hand.[87] If the master places proper tools and appliances where they are available to the servant, the latter cannot complain of a mere inconvenience to which he must submit in procuring them,[88] although a master does not discharge his duties by having proper appliances at hand when the workmen are not allowed to use them except by consent of their foreman.[89] Where the lack of them arises from a temporary condition in the progress of the work caused by the negligence of fellow workmen, no liability attaches to the master;[90] nor is a master liable for the failure to furnish appliances to prevent an injury which could not be anticipated by the exercise of ordinary care and foresight.[91]

§ 206. Nature and Kind of Appliances and Places

As a general rule it is necessary and sufficient for the master to furnish such instrumentalities and places for work as are reasonably safe and suitable.

A master is not required to furnish his servant with tools, machinery, appliances, and places for work which are absolutely safe,[92] or perfect,[93] or most expensive,[94] or the newest, safest and best, as discussed infra § 207, or similar to those used by others, although they may be less dangerous than his own,[95] nor need he furnish those of a particular kind;[96] but, broadly speaking, it is necessary for him to furnish such instrumentalities and places for work as are reasonably safe and suitable,[97] and it is

Duty not enlarged by promise
If appliance or place of work is reasonably safe, liability for damages for negligence cannot be cre-furnish reasonably safe and suitable instrumentalities and places for work;[99] that is, the master's obligation is to use due, reasonable, or ordinary care to furnish his servant with reasonably safe and suitable instrumentalities and places for work,[1] and, even though the instrumentalities or places for work furnished are not reasonably safe and suitable, still there is no liability on the part of the master if he has exercised the requisite degree of care to make them reasonably safe and suitable.[2] The phrase "reasonably safe" is a term of relative application,[3] and what is reasonably safe often depends on the facts and circumstances in the particular case,[4] and it is essential that regard should be had not only to the character of the work to be performed, but also to the ordinary hazards of the employment,[5] when the servant exercises reasonable care for his own safety.[6]

§ 207. —— Newest, Safest, and Best Appliances and Places

The master is not required to furnish the newest, safest, and best machinery, appliances, and places for work, but in all occupations attended with great dangers he must use all appliances readily obtainable for the prevention of accidents.

The master is not required to furnish the newest, safest, and best machinery, appliances, and places for work,[7] but his obligation is met when he

furnishes such as are reasonably safe and suitable for the purpose had in view, as discussed supra § 206. In all occupations attended with great and unusual dangers, however, there must be used all appliances readily obtainable for the prevention of accidents, and the neglect to provide such appliances is proof of culpable negligence.[8] An employer before adopting and installing a new and untried appliance is required to select that which seems to be the safest and most suitable for his purpose, and to consult the best available known sources of information for reliable advice as to the wisdom of the proposed experiment.[9]

§ 208. —— Appliances and Methods in Ordinary Use

The general custom or ordinary usage in vogue among others engaged in the same work under similar circumstances is an important, although not conclusive, factor or test to be used in determining whether the master has performed his duty of furnishing safe tools, machinery, and appliances.

Although conformity to custom or usage will not of itself excuse or justify negligence on the part of the master in furnishing tools, machinery, and appliances,[10] and the ultimate test of the master's liability is whether or not he has exercised due, ordinary, or reasonable care, and not whether he has conformed to custom or usage,[11] the general custom or ordinary usage in vogue among others engaged in the same work under similar circumstances is an important factor or test to be used in determining whether the master has performed his duty in this respect.[12] Ordinarily a master is deemed to have complied with the requirements of the law when he has furnished machinery, appliances, and ways, in conformity with common and ordinary custom or usage,[13] provided such custom or usage is such as a reasonably prudent person would ordinarily employ under similar circumstances[14] and is not in contravention of positive law,[15] and, on the other hand, his failure so to conform with such custom or usage may constitute negligence.[16] The fact that an appliance furnished is in common use is no defense to a charge of negligence based on the theory that it was not adapted to the particular purpose for which it was used and was negligently installed and maintained.[17]

§ 209. —— Uniform Character of Appliances

The master is not required to furnish uniform appliances.

§ 210. Appliances or Places Furnished by, or in Control of, Third Persons

As a general rule the duties and liabilities of the employer with respect to furnishing his employee with safe instrumentalities and places for work do not extend to instrumentalities and places owned by, and in the possession or control of, third persons.

As a general rule the duties and liabilities of the employer with respect to furnishing his employee with safe instrumentalities and places for work do not extend to instrumentalities and places owned by, and in the possession or control of, third persons,[19] and which the master has neither the duty nor the right to repair.[20] However, the mere fact that the place of work or appliance causing the injury is owned[21] or controlled[22] by another does not absolve the master of his ordinary duties and liabilities, and where the master is in control of the appliances used or of the premises or of the particular work done thereon by his servants, he is liable for any injuries resulting to them by reason of his negligence in failing to furnish them with reasonably safe appliances or a reasonably safe place of work, irrespective of the ownership of such premises or appliances.[23] So, if a master so uses and deals with instrumentalities or appliances in his business as practically to adopt them as his own, he becomes, as to his servant, the owner and is under the same duty to the servant as though he were the owner.[24] The master is not liable in any case, however, if he uses ordinary care to ascertain that the instrumentality or place is fit for its intended use.[25]

§ 211. —— Effect of Statutory Provisions

The master's liability to his servant for injuries received where the instrumentalities used or place of work is furnished by, or is in the control of, third persons may be affected by statutory provisions.

The master's liability to his servant for injuries received where the instrumentalities used or place of work is furnished by, or is in the control of, third persons may be affected by statutory provisions.[26] Whether or not under an employers' liability act a place or instrumentality furnished by another than the master, because of whose defective condition injuries result to an employee, is a part of the "ways, works, and machinery," or plant of the employer, connected with or used in his business, is usually dependent on the control exercised or exercisable over it by the master.[27] The rule is ordinarily the same under statutes of a less general character enacted for the protection of employees[28] except where the statute imposes an absolute duty.[29]

§ 212. —— Operation of Railroads

a. In general
b. Cars of other companies
c. Improper loading of cars
d. Railroad tracks and roadbeds
e. Obstructions on, over, or near railroad tracks
f. Liability of consignor or consignee to employees loading or unloading freight

a. In General

A carrier's statutory duty to furnish its employees with safe instrumentalities and places for work has been held to follow the employer even though the employee is sent upon the premises of another to do his work.

Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act a railroad company owes its employees the duty of furnishing a reasonably safe place to work, machinery, and instrumentalities, as discussed infra § 226, and this duty has been held to follow the employer even though the employee is sent upon the premises of another to do his work.[30] Where a railroad company is operating its train on the track of another under a traffic arrangement, the track is "its" property within the meaning of the Federal Employers' Liability Act[31] and the Federal Safety Appliance Act.[32] Where, under an agreement for running continuous trains over connected roads, one company has the exclusive right to employ and discharge trainmen, and is required to repair the locomotives for both roads, even though they are under the control of the other road while on its branch, it is liable for an injury to a servant caused by a defective engine, although it occurs on the other road.[33]

b. Cars of Other Companies

Ordinarily the duty of a railroad company in respect of a car received by it for transportation over its road is one of inspection only, and it is not responsible for latent defects which cannot be discovered by such an inspection as the exigencies of traffic will permit in the exercise of reasonable care.

Constitutional and statutory provisions which compel railroad companies to receive and transport over their lines the cars of other companies, without delay or discrimination, do not require them to receive cars in an unsafe condition, or so defective in their construction as to make it dangerous for their servants to handle them, and do not relieve the receiving company from liability for injuries sustained by one of its servants from such defective cars.[34]

While it has been held in some decisions that the responsibilities of a railroad company to its servants are the same in respect of cars of other companies which the servants are compelled to handle, as in respect of its own,[35] especially where the defect is not latent,[36] ordinarily the duty of such a company in respect of a car received by it for transportation over its road, in the ordinary course of business, is one of inspection only, and it is not held responsible for latent defects which cannot be discovered by such an inspection as the exigencies of traffic will permit in the exercise of reasonable care.[37] The fact that cars are used only for a brief time or carried a short distance will not excuse a railroad company from its duty of inspecting them,[38] but, since the negligence of the connecting line before the delivery of cars to another cannot be imputed to the latter, the duty to inspect will be measured only by what the company ought to have done while the cars were in its possession.[39] Lack of opportunity of inspection furnishes no excuse where a railroad company assumes control of a borrowed car and directs its servant to work on or about it.[40]

Under a statute imposing liability on a railroad for injuries to its employees caused by defective cars hauled or permitted to be hauled or used on its line, a railroad is not liable for an injury occurring while one of its employees is engaged in inspecting a car for the purpose of determining whether his employer should assume control,[41] and the employee's right of action under such circumstances is against the company delivering the car.[42] Where a railroad company receives a car of another company, and it is examined, and notice is given that it is defective and is to be returned, the company has fulfilled its duty with respect to the car, and is not liable for injuries resulting from such defect which a servant receives while the car is shifting about the yard.[43]

c. Improper Loading of Cars

Where a servant of a railroad company is injured by reason of the improper loading of a car by a third person, the company is not liable unless it has been in the habit of receiving and transporting such cars or has failed to provide a proper system of inspection.

Where a servant of a railroad company is injured by reason of the improper loading of a car received from another company,[44] or which has been loaded by the shipper,[45] the company is not liable unless it has been in the habit of receiving and

A railroad company as between itself and its servant must exercise reasonable care to make its road safe whether it owns the road or uses it under a contract with the owner.

A railroad company as between itself and its servant must exercise reasonable care and diligence to make its road safe whether it owns the road or uses it under contract with the owner.[48] Although a servant's employer, as owner of the road, has leased tracks to another company, it is not thereby relieved from the duty to keep safe the place where its servant is required to work;[49] and, where it has allowed another corporation to run its trains over its track, it has been held that such consenting company remains liable for the negligence of the other company as much as it would be for that of its own.[50] It has been held, however, that where two or more companies use a track in common, it is, although the exclusive property of one of the companies, for the time being the track of each company using it, and the proprietary company is not liable to its servants for injuries caused by the negligent use of the track by the servants of another company.[51] Where two railroads jointly lease and operate a connecting railroad, the duty of keeping the track and switch of such railroad in proper condition for the use of their employees rests on the two railroads jointly,[52] and, where a spur track is maintained for the mutual benefit of two companies, both are required to exercise ordinary care to see that the premises are reasonably safe.[53]

Conditions on land near tracks. A railroad owes a duty to its employees to be reasonably informed as to what has been or will be done by others on land near the railroad tracks affecting the safety of the roadbed and to use due care to guard against dangers resulting therefrom.[54]

e. Obstructions on, over, or near Railroad Tracks

Where a railroad company permits an obstruction to remain on, over, or near the tracks, and by reason of such obstruction its servant is injured, it has been held that the company is liable even though the obstruction belongs to, or is under the control of, a third person.

A railroad company is bound to exercise reasonable care to prevent obstructions on, over, or near the tracks which are a source of danger to its employees, as discussed infra § 230, and where a railroad company permits an obstruction, of which it has actual or constructive knowledge, to remain on, over, or near the tracks, and by reason of such obstruction its servant is injured, it has been held that the company is liable even though the obstruction belongs to, or is under the control of, a third person.[55] It has been held, however, that a railroad company may not be liable for injuries sustained by an employee where the obstruction causing the injury was maintained by a third person without the consent of the company and was not under its control.[56]

A consignor or consignee of freight is not liable for injuries to his servant received, while loading or unloading a railroad car, by reason of the defective condition of the car.[57] It has been held, however, that instrumentalities belonging to the railroad when used by the consignee in unloading freight are adopted by him, and he is responsible for their safety to his servants,[58] but that a depot platform is not an instrumentality within the meaning of this rule.[59]

must furnish suitable appliances for the dangerous work,[63] such as appliances in general use for such work.[64]

b. Health Protection and Disease Prevention

While it has been held that at common law the servant could not recover for injuries resulting from occupational diseases, he may do so where the master fails to comply with the requirements of a statute designed to protect the servant from the danger of illness or disease incident to the dangerous character of his occupation.

While it has been held that there is no common-law duty on an employer to furnish a healthful and sanitary place of work, as distinguished from a safe place to work,[65] and that there can be no recovery for occupational diseases resulting from his failure to do so in the absence of a statute properly defining the employer's liability for occupational diseases,[66] it has also been held that the duty of providing a reasonably safe place to work operates to protect employees against dangers of employment which may reasonably be expected to produce disease, as well as those reasonably expected to produce ordinary physical injuries;[67] and that a disease resulting from the tort of the master in failing to furnish a proper place to work is not an occupational disease for which, at common law, the master would not be liable.[68]

In some states laws have been enacted for the purpose of protecting the employee from the danger of illness or disease incident to the dangerous character of his occupation,[69] and an employee may recover for an injury sustained by him, through illness or disease, by reason of the failure of the employer to comply with the requirements thereof,[70] and it has been held that such recovery may be

69. The primary purpose of statutes requiring exhaust fans or similar apparatus to be used to protect employees against dust filaments or injurious gases was to guard workmen's health, and a factory, workshop, or other establishment may not place a workman on the outside of a building at exhaust end of a dust pipe and require him to perform duties within flow of exhaust and escape requirements of statute on theory that workman was placed in the open air and that the statute was inoperative with respect to him.—Tennessee Eastman Corporation v. Newman, 121 S.W.2d 130, 22 Tenn. App. 270.

Characteristics of statutes
(1) Statute requiring proper ventilation imposes no new rule or measure of conduct on employer, but, at most, extends and defines common-law duty of reasonable care; it establishes new standards of care but not new causes of action.—Schmidt v. Co., 200 N.E. 824, 270 N.Y. 287, reargument denied 2 N.E. 2d 680.

(2) The provisions of statute concerning furnishing safe working conditions are merely declaratory of common law and provide a means by which the ends may be reached as required by common law.

Floor drainage
The words "stand while working," in statute requiring floors of workshops in which wet processes are used to be so drained that there is no measurable depth of water in which employees must stand while working, did not mean that employee must remain stationary while performing his work.—Fredrickson v. Arrowhead Co-op. Creamery Ass'n, 277 N.W. 345, 202 Minn. 12.

Places within ventilation statutes
Under statute requiring every factory, workshop, association, or other establishment where work or process is carried on by which dust filaments or injurious gases liable to be inhaled by employees are produced or generated, to be provided with exhaust fans or other means to pur-

had irrespective of the employer's negligence.[71] The injury or illness, however, must be the result of the employer's violation of the statute,[72] and must be such as against which the statute was intended to protect;[73] and the work engaged in must be within the terms of the statute.[74] It is not enough that a certificate of approval of conditions in the place of work has been issued by the proper authorities.[75] One who makes no effort whatever to comply with such a statute may not complain that the statute is indefinite.[76]

Under statutes requiring safety devices, whether the particular device adopted is sufficient to comply with the statute depends on the facts of the particular case.[77] An inefficient device does not fulfill the employer's duty.[78] An approved device within the meaning of a statute requiring the employer to furnish approved safety devices does not mean one approved by the employers for whose use it was made;[79] and, where the statute so requires, it is not enough that the device be approved but it must also be adequate;[80] but the adoption of any one of several approved and adequate devices may be a sufficient compliance with the statute.[81]

c. Explosives

A master who manufactures, stores, or uses explosives or materials likely to explode in his business must exercise a degree of care for the safety of his servants commensurate with the danger reasonably to be anticipated.

A master who is engaged in the business of manufacturing or storing explosives[82] or who employs dynamite or other explosives as instrumentalities in carrying on his business[83] must exercise a degree of care for the safety of his servants commensurate with the danger reasonably to be anticipated, and a failure to discharge his duty in this respect constitutes negligence. There can, however, be no recovery by an employee against the employer for injuries caused by an explosion in the absence of negligence on the part of the employer.[84] So also a master who, in the course of his business, uses substances or material of a highly explosive character,[85] or employs contrivances, appliances, or expedients likely to cause explosion,[86] or whose business is of such a character that explosions are to be anticipated from the nature of substances on

Gasoline in open can
If a mechanic's use of an open can of gasoline in priming an engine was inherently dangerous and was necessary because of the employer's negligence in not furnishing a safe priming can, and where even though the mechanic used the can carefully the gasoline ignited and he threw it onto his helper, the employer would be liable for damages attributable to its negligence.—Proctor & Gamble Defense Corp. v. Bean, C.C. A.Miss., 146 F.2d 598.

such premises[87] or from gases accumulating thereon[88] will be liable to an employee for injuries resulting from his failure to exercise that degree of care which the character of the business would demand from a reasonably prudent person.

A master will not be liable for injuries resulting from an explosion when the explosive came upon the premises of the place of work without his knowledge and without negligence on his part,[89] and the fact that injuries resulted to its employees from an explosion on premises where dynamite was handled in proximity to the place of work does not make the master liable for such injuries on the ground that it furnished an unsafe place to work.[90]

§ 215. —— Dangerous or Defective Machinery

The mere fact that the master requires the servant to work on machinery which is inherently dangerous does not constitute negligence, and the master is not liable for the servant's injury if he has exercised such reasonable care in the installation, maintenance, and operation of such machinery as is commensurate with the dangers involved.

While the master's duty to furnish reasonably safe machinery and appliances does not forbid him to place a servant at work on machinery which is inherently dangerous, and the mere fact that injuries have resulted in the course of such employment does not of itself constitute negligence,[91] the master is nevertheless required to exercise such reasonable care in respect of the installation, maintenance, and operation of such machinery as is commensurate with the dangers involved, and he will be liable for injuries resulting from his failure to exercise such care[92] or from his failure to comply with any statutory provisions with respect thereto.[93] The word "defect," as used in an employers' liability act has been held to refer to the condition of machinery with regard to the safety of employees rather than the working capacity of the machine,[94] and to remedy a defect requires that the dangerous condition must have ended rather than that the machine must have been made perfect for working purposes.[95]

It has been held to be immaterial that the servant knows as much about a complicated instrumentality as the employer, as far as the duty of the latter to furnish safe instrumentalities is concerned.[96]

§ 216. —— Simple Tools and Appliances

The rule as to the duty of the master to furnish safe tools and appliances does not apply to simple tools in common use, but the master is not absolved in all cases from liability for injury to the servant from the use of a simple tool.

The rule as to the duty of the master in furnishing the servant with safe tools and appliances does not apply to simple tools in common use and with which the master and servant are equally familiar,[97] and selection by the employer of one simple Tex.—Henwood v. Neal, Civ.App., 198 S.W.2d 125.

Care in selection

In determining whether master has exercised ordinary care in selecting and inspecting tool, simplicity of tool and skill required in its use should be considered.—Smith v. McEachin, 57 S.W.2d 1043, 186 Ark. 1132.

Unsafe tool

A shovel with a worn edge is not necessarily an unsafe tool for negligence in furnishing which master would be liable, since shovel with worn edge is not inherently dangerous and, unless subject to use not ordinarily intended, such condition would not reasonably be anticipated to cause injury, although worn edge might increase amount of labor expended in doing work.—Fischer v. City of Cape Girardeau, 131 S.W.2d 521, 345 Mo. 122.

Short ladder

Master is obligated to furnish ladder of sufficient length or timbers long enough to make ladder of sufficient length, and hence was liable that the instrumentality causing the injury was a simple appliance and that danger did not inhere in the appliance itself, but arose from the manner in which it was used, where the injury occurred from the use of the appliance in the manner that the master expected and required the servant to use it,[2] nor will he be relieved of liability where the defect is of a kind that reasonably imports menace of substantial injury.[3]

Since one element of the simple-tool rule is the servant's equal opportunity with the master to inspect the tools and appliances,[4] the rule does not apply where the servant's duties are such as not to afford him such opportunity.[5] The simple-tool doctrine operates only when the workman injured is using the particular tool from which the injury results,[6] and has been held not to operate when the tool is not being used as such.[7]

§ 217. —— Temporary Appliances, Structures, or Dangers

The rule requiring the master to furnish a safe place in which to work has been held not to apply to structures or instrumentalities of a temporary nature.

The general rule requiring a master to furnish a safe place in which to work is usually applied to a permanent or quasi-permanent place and not to structures or instrumentalities of a temporary nature employed by the servants in preparation for, or in the progress of, their work;[8] nor will a master be liable for injuries resulting to the employee from mere temporary conditions interfering with the safety of the place to work[9] or for injuries resulting from conditions giving rise to perils of a transitory character.[10]

§ 218. —— Horses and Vehicles

The rule requiring the master to furnish reasonably safe instrumentalities extends to and includes horses and other animals used in his work, and vehicles and appurtenances, connected therewith.

The rule that a master must use reasonable care to furnish his servant with reasonably safe instrumentalities extends to and includes horses and other animals used in his work, wagons, and other vehicles, harnesses, and appliances connected therewith.[11] Thus, when a master knows or should where journeyman carpenter, to compensate for insufficient length of ladder, nailed timber to tank for use as handhold with master's knowledge, and was injured when timber gave way.—Fellsmere Sugar Co. v. Marshall, 167 So. 649, 123 Fla. 378.

Repair

Master's duty to exercise ordinary care in making safe truck tire for employee's use was fully discharged by sending tire to independent contractors, experts, for making repairs and showing by them of how repairs were made and return of tire in apparently first-class condition.—Kemp v. Hunter Transfer Co., 41 S.W.2d 981, 184 Ark. 13.

Servants of agent

Where, under facts, petroleum company's agent in charge of its bulk sales station was company's servant rather than independent con-

know that an animal used by him is vicious[12] or that his harness or vehicle is not reasonably safe,[13] he is liable for injuries to his servant caused thereby. Although ordinarily knowledge, actual or constructive, on the part of the master of the vicious nature of an animal furnished to a servant is essential to liability,[14] it has been held that the liability of the master is governed rather by his duty to use reasonable care to furnish the servant a reasonably safe instrumentality with which to perform his work.[15] The employer has been held not negligent in furnishing an animal where the servant knew its condition as well as the master did.[16]

A motor vehicle operated on a public highway has been considered a dangerous instrumentality,[17] and it is the duty of the master to equip his vehicles with proper safety appliances.[18] A statute specifying how motor vehicles shall be equipped, although penal, has been held to set the standard of care required of an employer.[19] Where the master has fulfilled his obligation by furnishing a reasonably safe vehicle, it has been held that he cannot be held liable for failure to furnish equipment which might make it more safe.[20]

A domestic servant required to ride in a vehicle of the master in the course of employment is not a guest[21] and is entitled to recover for injuries resulting from the employer's negligence.[22]

A master must furnish a reasonably safe appliance for unloading a vehicle,[23] and a master is also liable for injuries sustained by a servant through the premature starting of his team resulting from the master's negligence while the servant is in a dangerous position about the vehicle in the prosecution of his duties.[24]

tractor, and driver employed to drive agent's delivery truck was likewise company's servant, company, notwithstanding agent's like duty, was required to furnish driver safe truck and keep it in repair, so that company was liable to driver for injury caused by alleged defect in truck.—Texas Co. v. Mills, 156 So. 866, 171 Miss. 231.

Lights

(1) Where an employer furnished employee with pushcart not equipped with lights, and employee was required to operate it at night on public highways, the employer would be liable to its employee for injuries sustained by him when he was struck at night by automobile while delivering mail in pushcart from depot to post office, if equipping pushcart with lights tended to promote his safety and failure to do so caused the accident; and the standard by which it was to be judged whether the employer was negligent was not care required by any of the provisions of state highway regulatory act, but the care which an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under similar circumstances.—Taylor v. Texas & N. O. R. Co., La.App., 22 So.2d 771.

(2) Cause of action of truck driver against truck owner for injuries sustained in accident allegedly caused by failure of lighting system on truck does not fall within the scope of the Oregon Employers' Liability Act.—White v. Consolidated Freight Lines, 73 P.2d 358, 192 Wash. 146.

Vehicle furnished by servant for use on streets

Where employer had no control over the streets or employee's motorcycle used by employee in making deliveries, employer was not liable for employee's death by being thrown against a light pole when employee's motorcycle skidded on an icy street while employee was making a delivery since rule requiring the master to use ordinary care to furnish his servant with safe appliances and a reasonably safe place to work is based on possession and control by master of the appliances used in premises where the work is performed.—Pfiester's Adm'r v. Where the only negligence in respect of lights charged against owner of truck parked on highway was the violation of statutes requiring lights between specified hours, and instructions were based entirely on such statutes, negligence of truck owner to employee could not be predicated on failure to maintain lights if evidence supported jury's finding that accident did not occur between the statutory hours.—Bohlmann v. Relative matter

A reasonably safe place in which to work is a relative matter, and whether master has exercised ordinary care to provide reasonably safe place depends on facts of each case.—Southern Mining Co. v. Lawson, 131 S.W.2d 831, 279 Ky. 659—High Splint Coal Co. v. Baker, 57 S.W.2d 60, 247 Ky. 426.

of a property owner to an invitee.[26]

The rule does not apply when the place of work and conditions as to safety are constantly changing as the work progresses and the prosecution of the work itself makes the place and creates the danger.[27] Likewise the rule does not apply when the place of work becomes dangerous only by the carelessness or negligence of the workmen,[28] nor does it apply where the servant selects his own place of work[29] or where the place was one in which the servant had no duty to perform and to which he was not required to go.[30] However, even where the progress of the work enhances the danger, the employer must use ordinary care to make the place as safe as it can be made under the conditions of the work to be performed.[31] This exception to the rule has been abrogated by some statutes and the ordinary rule applies even when by reason of the acts of the servants the conditions are constantly changing[32] or the nature of the employment is hazardous.[33] The exception to the general rule has no application where the master has assumed personal direction of such a place of work,[34] where the injuries to an employee, although received in a place of work constantly changing in character, were not caused by any changing condition in the prosecution of the work,[35] or where the nature and conditions of the work remain constant although there are different steps in the work.[36]

The employer has been held not to be obligated to furnish a place which is safe for everyone, but the place must be safe for the average employee.[37]

Farm labor does not generally come within a statute requiring the employer to furnish a safe place to work[38] except where farming is carried on by means of mechanical power.[39]

Duty of servant
Where experienced logger was engaged in clearing reservoir site and skidding and piling logs and work changed from place to place as site was cleared, it was logger's duty to use ordinary care to make his own place of work safe and master could not be held liable for alleged failure to furnish safe place to work.—M. b. What Constitutes Place of Work

The duty of the employer to furnish a reasonably safe place to work extends to places where the servants are expressly or impliedly invited and permitted to use, and requires the employer to provide reasonably safe means of ingress and egress and passageways.

While ordinarily the duty of the employer to furnish employees a reasonably safe place to work is limited to the premises where the employees are required to be for the purposes of their employment[40] when used in the ordinary way for the purpose for which they were intended,[41] it nevertheless extends to such other places as they are expressly or impliedly invited and permitted to use;[42] and this includes rooms and places properly resorted to by them incidentally to their employment, by virtue of such an invitation or permission,[43] but not to places when the employee goes for his own convenience and where he is not expected to be.[44]

Ways. The master's duty to use ordinary care to furnish the servant with a reasonably safe place for his work is not restricted to the identical situs of the labor, but extends to the exercise of ordinary care to see that the means of egress and ingress and ways customarily used by the servant in passing from one part of the premises to another in the course of his employment are reasonably safe,[45]

Length of time in one place
Employee's place of work is that where his employment puts him to work, the length of time an employee works in one place not being determinative.—Baker v. High Splint Coal Co., 81 S.W.2d 577, 258 Ky. 786.

Machine
The place of work of an employee is the location, the situs, or the premises, and if an injury occurs there by force of an independent defect in a machine which is being used at the place, the wrong must be laid on, and proved against, the machine, and is not to be ascribed to the more general conception of a safe place to work.—J. W. Sanders Cotton Mill v. Moody, 195 So. 683, 189 Miss. 284.

Place used in enterprise
The words "place of employment" as used in statute requiring employer to furnish a safe place of employment for employees and frequenters are descriptive, furnish an outline of a definition, and indicate a purpose to protect employees and lawful frequenters, and carry the idea of a place necessarily used by one or more persons engaged in an enterprise for the purpose of gain or profit, direct or indirect.—Mennetti v. since a place provided for employees in going to and from work is a place of work.[46] The mere fact that an unusual way was occasionally used by employees for convenience as a means of egress and ingress will not convert it into a passageway,[47] and, where an employee sustains injuries while unnecessarily taking a dangerous route instead of a safe route, he cannot contend that it was the duty of the employer to keep the route free from obstructions,[48] but the fact that there was another route, and that the route used was merely a private passageway, is immaterial where it has been used regularly to the knowledge of the employer.[49] At common law and in the absence of contract the duty of the employer does not extend to furnishing ways over premises not under his control.[50] Where, however, the employer contracts to do work on the premises of another, it has been held that he is under a duty to see that the means of ingress and egress on such premises are kept reasonably safe, even though he has no control over such means so that he can directly remedy conditions therein, where he can compel the owner to do so or refuse to proceed with the work until the condition is remedied.[51]

c. Lights

The duty to furnish a safe place of work includes the duty of furnishing sufficient light when necessary.

The duty of the master to furnish the servant with a safe place of work includes the duty of furnishing sufficient light when necessary for the place of work,[52] and this duty extends to passageways and stairways used by the servant in going to and from his work and from place to place in the course of his employment.[53] A master, however, will not

An employer in furnishing a step to a rest room was required only to furnish a step which under the circumstances was reasonably safe, and the step was not required to be absolutely safe, or reasonably safe, provided the employer had used reasonable care to make it so; and reasonableness of an employer in maintaining a place or way must be defined in terms of an expectation that the servant will exercise reasonable care in using the place or way, and that is particularly true where injury is caused by a servant's missing his step.—Supreme Instruments Corporation v. d. Construction, Reconstruction, or Demolition of Building

Except as otherwise provided by statute or ordinance, the duty to furnish a reasonably safe place to work does not extend to buildings in the process of construction or of demolition or dismantling.

In general the obligation of a master to provide reasonably safe places and structures for his servant to work upon does not extend to buildings in process of construction,[57] or of demolition or dismantling,[58] where the successive temporary conditions through which such structures must pass in such operations must from the very nature thereof be dangerous; but the master has been held liable for injuries to a servant whose work, although part of construction, was not of a shifting character[59] or where the situation existed for such time as to give the employer notice thereof.[60]

A number of statutes have been enacted providing for the protection and safety of persons in and about the construction, repairing, alteration, or removal of buildings and other structures.[61] An employer is charged with notice of dangerous methods he is using in violation of the provisions of such a statute,[62] and ignorance of the statute offers no excuse for its violation,[63] and it has been held that a palpable violation of such a law will constitute gross negligence;[64] but an employee cannot predicate his action on a violation of the statute when his injuries were not due to any defects in the appliances or instrumentalities mentioned in the statute.[65] Such statutes are to be reasonably construed.[66] A statute providing that a person employing or directing anor because head of stairway was not protected by gate.—Bruce v. Baer, Mo.App., 76 S.W.2d 423.

(2) House owner was held not negligent, where domestic servant fell down open stairway to basement while groping for light switch, where no defect was shown in approach to steps or in steps.—Martin v. Davis, 170 A. 307, 111 Pa.Super. 420.

(3) Domestic servant employed in private dwelling house was not entitled to recover for injuries suffered in falling down unlighted stairway while engaged in performance of her duties, under statute requiring stairways, machinery, and dangerous places to be kept properly lighted during working hours, which was inapplicable to domestic service or agricultural labor.—Dahlen v. Temporary floors
(1) Where two stories of building intended to consist of more than other to perform labor in the erection, repairing, altering, or painting of a house, building, or "structure" shall not furnish or erect any improper or defective scaffolding has been held to have no application to the work of tearing down a building.[67] It has also been held that, where the servant was injured by reason of a defective platform, the employer's liability could not be predicated on a failure to provide a safe place of work under a state employers' liability act, as he was not bound to guard against dangers incident to the work of razing structures.[68] An ordinance requiring the construction of a roof over the part of the sidewalk required to be kept clear in front of a building in process of erection is not limited to the protection of travelers on the street but is also for the benefit of employees at work on the building.[69]

e. Fire Escapes

In the absence of statute the safe-place rule does not require the master to provide fire escapes unless the business is hazardous because of its liability to fire.

It is no part of the duty of a master to a servant employed in a building properly constructed for the ordinary business carried on within it, in the absence of a statutory requirement,[70] to provide a means of escape from a fire which is not caused by his negligence,[71] although it has been held that, where the business is hazardous because of its liability to fire, the common law imposes on the master the duty to exercise ordinary care to provide means of escape for servants in case of fire.[72]

Statutes requiring the equipping of factories and mercantile establishments with sufficient and reasonable fire escapes are mandatory,[73] and an employer is not excused by the fact that no notice to provide such escapes has been given by any factory inspector,[74] nor can the requirement be dispensed with by a factory inspector when the enforcement has been intrusted to a state officer[75] or by the board of aldermen when jurisdiction is vested in a city department.[76] Substantial compliance with the statute is sufficient,[77] but the fact that a fire escape is built pursuant to the statute does not prove it to be adequate when the state prescribes no standard,[78] and the duty of the employer is not fulfilled by providing any number of means of egress, if the means of escape provided are not sufficient and reasonable means of escape in case of fire.[79]

§ 220. —— Platforms, Scaffolds, and Supports

The master must exercise ordinary care to see that a platform, scaffold, staging, or like structure furnished by him or built under his direction and control is reasonably safe for the purpose contemplated.

Where a master furnishes or causes to be built under his direction and control a platform, scaffold, staging, or like structure for the use of his servants in the furtherance of their work, it is his duty to exercise ordinary care to see that it is reasonably safe for the purpose contemplated,[80] although the two stories are erected, statute requiring temporary floors to protect workmen requires that temporary floors be laid.—Hoffman v. Department of Industrial Relations, Division of Industrial Accidents and Safety, 287 P. 974, 209 Cal. 383, 68 A.L.R. 294.

(2) Duty of planking over, in compliance with labor law and city's building code, spaces on floors where iron workers were engaged is on general contractor.—Caminiti v. Matthews Const. Co., 272 N.Y.S. 245, 241 App.Div. 879.

(3) Contractor or builder is not required to lay temporary floor, where plans do not require permanent floors.—Crabb v. Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co., 250 P. 926, 120 Okl. 182.

(4) Other decisions with respect to temporary floors see 39 C.J. p 352 note 61 [b], [e]-[g].

Guarding of shafts

(1) Under a statute requiring temporary flooring every two floors of a building under construction, the space which need not be covered with temporary floors to protect workmen constructing building is space for elevator shaft or similar space.—Hoffman v. master is not held to the same quantum of care in the erection of platforms and scaffolds intended for temporary use as he is in the building and maintenance of more permanent structures;[81] and where the structure is erected by the workmen from material furnished by the master, and the master has no direction or control of the construction, he is not liable for injuries sustained by one of the workmen by reason of defects in the structure,[82] provided he has used reasonable care in his selection of proper and suitable material.[83] A master may adopt a platform or scaffold so constructed by his servants, and if he then furnishes such a structure to them for use in their work he will be liable for any injuries resulting from the defective manner of its construction.[84]

Statutory regulations. It has generally been held that a platform, scaffold, or support, although portable or temporary in character, is within the meaning of the words "ways, works, and machinery," or "plant" of the employer as used in the state employers' liability acts;[85] and, in the case of a scaffold, it has been held that this is true, even though the employee participated in the construction thereof,[86] although there is also authority to the contrary.[87] The duty of the master in respect of platforms, scaffolds, and supports has been specifically regulated by some statutes which generally impose an absolute duty on the employer,[88] and this duty requires an employer to furnish safe scaffolds and

Duty of employee to select material
A carpenter's employer which furnished material for construction of staging by carpenter was not liable for injuries sustained by carpenter when defective plank in staging floor broke while carpenter was standing thereon where there was no evidence that supply of planks used for staging did not contain a sufficient number of suitable quality for use in staging, or evidence that any planks were defective when brought to premises, or that defect and cement coating on plank did not arise during course of work on project in which carpenter was engaged, and carpenter knew that it was part of his work to determine whether planks were fit for use and to reject unsuitable ones, and carpenter had no reason to believe that employer had inspected planks after they were brought to premises.—Ireland v. act.[19] Where a statute requires an employer to examine frequently and keep in sound condition the ropes, gearing, and other parts of an elevator, an absolute liability on the part of the employer is not thereby created and he does not, by reason thereof, become an insurer of the safety of an employee, but his duty is discharged if there is such a frequent examination, and the parts of the elevator are kept as free from danger as the nature of the employment reasonably permits.[20]

§ 222. —— Mines, Quarries, and Excavations

a. In general
b. Mines
c. Trenches, tunnels, and other excavations
d. Blasting

a. In General

A master employing a servant in a mine, quarry, tunnel, pit, trench, or other excavation must use reasonable care to make his place of work as reasonably safe as the nature of the work permits, and must comply with statutory requirements enacted for the protection of servants engaged in such employment.

Where a servant is employed in a mine, quarry, tunnel, pit, trench, or other excavation, the master owes him the duty to use ordinary and reasonable care and diligence to make his place of work as reasonably safe as the nature of the work permits.[21] Where, however, it is the duty of the workmen to shore up, or otherwise make safe, the place of work as the work progresses, the master's duty is fulfilled when he furnishes them with suitable material for the purpose,[22] nor does the general rule apply to a place which is constantly changing by reason of the work done[23] except where the servant's work does not contribute to the unsafe condition.[24]

Statutory regulations. The negligent failure of a master to comply with statutory requirements which have been enacted for the protection of a servant engaged in such employment will render him liable for injuries resulting to the latter therefrom.[25] The right to recover under such a statute may be based on an inadvertent failure to comply with its requirements as well as on an intentional violation thereof,[26] and where a statute gives a cause of action for a willful violation thereof, it is only necessary to show an intentional and conscious refusal to comply therewith and it is no defense to such an action that the employer acted in good faith.[27] Under such a statute it has been held that the employer is liable not only when the dangerous conditions are known to him, but also when, by the exercise of reasonable care, he could have discovered them.[28] In order to hold a master liable for a violation of the statute, the servant must be shown to be within the class contemplated by the statute and within the purpose and protection for which the law was enacted.[29] Such statutes must be construed according to the natural, obvious, and popular meaning of their language.[30] The fact that a statute fixes a penalty for its violation does not exclude an action for damages.[31]

permits, and must comply with statutory provisions enacted for the protection of miners with respect to their place of work.

It is the duty of a mine owner or operator to use ordinary care and diligence to keep its entries, passageways, and other places used in general by the miners in the prosecution of the work of the mine in as reasonably safe a condition as the nature of the work permits,[32] but, where the place of work is constantly changing by reason of the progress of the work of the miner himself, the rule that it is the master's duty to furnish a safe place of work does not apply.[33] So also a mine owner or operator will not be liable for the injuries occurring while the employee is engaged in making a dangerous place safe;[34] but this rule does not apply to an employee whose work is not mining but cleaning debris from a chamber.[35]

A number of statutes have been enacted for the protection of miners in respect of their place of work.[36] Such statutes are to be reasonably construed,[37] and in order to recover the miner must show that he is within the class contemplated by the statute and within its purpose and protection.[38] A mine owner or operator who negligently fails to comply with the requirements of the statute will be liable for resulting injuries,[39] and may be liable although the statute neither attaches a penalty nor provides a remedy for failure to comply with its terms.[40]

The provisions of an act that no one shall be allowed to enter a mine to work therein except under the directions of the mine manager "until all conditions have been made safe" apply to all dangerous places whether such places are dangerous by virtue of their original construction or conditions subsequently arising;[41] and to permit a miner to enter a mine to work therein otherwise than under the direction of the mine manager renders the mine owner liable for a willful violation of the act.[42] Noncompliance with a statutory requirement that the mine examiners shall inspect all places where men are expected to pass or work and when a dangerous condition is discovered shall make a mark

36. Protection from gas
(1) The duty of a fire boss of a mine to examine the conditions of the mine, when gas is known to exist therein, before men are permitted to enter for work, is a duty of "superintendence," within employers' liability act making an employee liable for injury caused by the negligence of one intrusted with superintendence, while in the exercise of such superintendence, and this is true irrespective of code providing that when gas is known to exist in a mine the operator must employ a competent fire boss to examine every place in the mine before men are permitted to enter for work.—Pratt Cons. Coal Co. v. Davidson, 55 So. 886, 173 Ala. 667.
(2) Statutory provision for safeguards and protection from gas in abandoned parts of mine applied only to gaseous mines and not to a mine where no gaseous condition had been previously found or known to exist.—Raven Red Ash Coal Co. v. Griffith, 27 S.E.2d 360, 181 Va. 911.

thereat will make the employer liable for resulting injuries,[43] and a servant employed for the purpose of making dangerous places safe is entitled under such a provision to receive notice, and be informed, of all dangerous places found by the mine examiner,[44] but, when such places have been marked, the statutory provision that all dangerous places in a mine shall be made safe before a company man engaged for that purpose shall be permitted to enter under the direction of the mine manager does not apply, and the master may send a servant to make a place safe without incurring liability during the progress of the work.[45] A mine foreman statute does not absolve the mine operator from his duty to exercise reasonable care to provide a safe place to work except in so far as such duty is devolved on the mine foreman.[46] Where a duty is imposed in part on the mine foreman and in part on the operator, the latter will be liable for injuries arising from his failure to comply with the statute.[47] If an employer who has employed a mine boss in compliance with the statutory requirements ousts him from the discharge of his duty and undertakes the performance of such duty himself, it is liable for injuries resulting from its negligence with respect thereto.[48] Where a mine foreman statute requires a foreman if employees in the mine exceed a certain number, an employee working outside the mine is not to be included in determining whether the number comes within the provision.[49]

What constitutes a mine within the terms of a specific statute depends on the facts of the particular case;[50] and the size of the mine has been held immaterial on the question whether a particular statute is applicable.[51] Statutes regulating the employer's duty as to mine safety have been held not abrogated by passage of a workmen's compensation act.[52] A statute requiring the furnishing of respirators to certain classes of employees has been held not applicable to miners.[53]

(2) Timbering or Propping Roof

At common law the master has the duty to keep roofs of entries and other parts of a mine used in general by the miners in a safe condition, while the miner must timber the roof of the particular room where he is working. There must be a compliance with statutory provisions relative to the duty of the owner or operator to keep roofs in a safe condition and to furnish mine props.

Under the common law it is the duty of the master to keep the roofs of entries, haulways, and other parts of the mine used in general by the miners in a safe condition,[54] but the owner is not an insurer of the safety thereof.[55] On the other hand, under the general rule, discussed supra § 219, that, where the place of work is constantly changing as the work progresses, a master will not be liable for injuries sustained by the workman by reason of the dangers arising in the progress of such work, it is the duty of the miner to timber the roof of a particular room where he is working,[56] although it has been held that this duty on the part of the miner may be changed by the custom of the mine.[57] However, the mere fact that the miner was at his place of work when injured is not determinative of the question whether it was his duty to look out for his own safety,[58] and the mere fact that he was working at a particular place does not constitute such place his working place.[59] Moreover, the general rule in re-

Duty as affected by foreman's order
Where it is duty of miner to timber roof of room where he is working, coal company is not liable to miner, injured by fall of slate, on theory that he was ordered to work in a dangerous place, because foreman had instructed him to remove slate or timber it.—Perkins-Harlan Coal Co. v. spect of the duty of the mine operator does not extend to a servant who has been employed for the specific purpose of making a dangerous place safe.[60]

Statutory provisions. Under statutes in effect declaratory of the common law it is the mine operator's duty to keep the roofs of passageways and places used in general by the miner in a safe condition[61] and the miner's duty to prop and protect his place of work;[62] but it has been held that the statutory duty of the miner properly to support the roof and entries under his control may be modified by agreement.[63] A statute requiring every workman in need of props and timbers to give notification of such fact to the owner does not in turn impose on every miner the duty of complying with the statute, but the custom of the mine may be proved for the purpose of showing on whom the duty of propping rests,[64] and even if the company's rules imposed such a duty on every miner such rules may be shown to have been waived.[65]

Under some statutes mine owners must furnish suitable props when required for the working place of the miner,[66] and in some cases it is required that such props shall be kept in a place of easy access to the miner.[67] Under other statutes the duty of the master to furnish sufficient props and timbers arises only after demand by the employee.[68] Where the statute imposes the duty on the mine owner of supplying props without qualification, it is not necessary that a request for them should have been made by the miner in order to hold the owner liable.[69] Where the statute gives the right to the miner to determine the length and dimensions of the props desired, the master must furnish the particular and specified kind, if the demand is not unusual,[70] but, where the demand is general and not specific, the master will not be deemed guilty of a willful violation of the act if he has furnished what in his best judgment will suffice for the purpose.[71] Where the duty of the operator to furnish props is dependent on the miner's first having selected and marked the props he desired from a supply to be maintained by the operator within a reasonable distance from the mine, the miner cannot recover because of the operator's failure to furnish the props unless he had previously selected and marked such as he needed,[72] and, when so provided by statute, unless he has designated the places of delivery of the timber selected,[73] and his failure cannot be excused by a custom of the mine;[74] but where the operator has not kept such a supply conveniently accessible the miner is not required to select and mark, and his request will be sufficient to impose on the operator the duty of furnishing props.[75]

The failure of the owner to comply with statutory requirements as to furnishing of props or timbers constitutes actionable negligence[76] although it has been held that the defense of contributory negligence may be availed of by the operator.[77] Only those having use for props and the right to demand them may complain of a willful violation on the part of the mine manager to comply with such demand.[78]

(3) Elevators and Hoists

The owner or operator must use reasonable care to furnish and maintain in proper repair suitable elevators and hoists, and appliances used in connection therewith, and he must comply with appropriate statutory requirements.

The master must use reasonable care to provide proper elevators and hoists in mines and appliances used in connection therewith and must maintain them in proper repair,[79] and in many states the nature and use of such places and equipment has been made the subject of statutory regulations so that an employee may recover in an action for injuries based on negligence in not complying with such a statute when the object of the statute is the protection of the employee.[80] The fact that a penalty is imposed for a violation thereof does not make an operator violating such a statute immune from civil liability,[81] and the employer cannot excuse nonperformance on the ground that he cannot comply with the statute by exercising ordinary care.[82] Such statutes are in general to be reasonably construed[83] although it has been held that they should receive a liberal construction to give the greatest effect to their purposes.[84]

(4) Ventilation

The owner of a mine must furnish sufficient ventilation in the mine for the safety of his employees.

It is the common-law duty of the operator to use ordinary care to furnish sufficient ventilation in the mine for the safety of his employees.[85] Under some statutes the duty is imposed on a mine owner or operator to maintain a certain amount of ventilation and to keep the mine free from noxious gases[86] and he will be liable for injuries resulting from his failure to comply with the provisions of such a statute.[87] It is no defense to an action for negligence based on noncompliance with the statute that it is not practicable to comply therewith.[88] In order to impose liability failure need not be willful,[89] and a conscious neglect to comply with such a statute is "willful" neglect within the meaning of that term as used in the statute.[90] The duty imposed by such a statute cannot be avoided by the owner entering into a contract with a third person for the operation of the mine.[91] Where a mine has progressed to the extent that coal has been taken therefrom, it is within the purview of the statute whose application is not restricted to cases where the coal is being marketed and sold.[92] Where, however, the owner or operator has provided and maintained ample means of ventilation prescribed by the statute, he will not be liable for the negligence with respect thereto of a competent mine boss employed pursuant to a statute.[93] Although there is authority to the contrary,[94] statutory provisions requiring elimination of smoke and noxious gases have been held not to impose a duty on the employer to eliminate dust incident to mining operations,[95] and whether the employer is liable in such case must be determined by whether he furnished a safe place to work as measured by the standards of the common law.[96]

(5) Escapements and Places of Refuge

Reasonable care must be exercised to provide reasonably safe means of escape from a mine.

mon law,[98] it is the duty of the owner or operator of a coal mine to exercise reasonable care to see that a place which a servant is invited to use as an escape way is reasonably safe. The company will be liable for its negligent failure to keep such a way reasonably safe for a miner who was invited to use it as a passage whether or not he was actually engaged in his duties.[99]

c. Trenches, Tunnels, and Other Excavations

It is the duty of the master to furnish a reasonably safe place of work to employees working in quarries, pits, trenches, and other excavations.

It is the duty of the master to furnish a reasonably safe place of work to employees working in quarries, pits, trenches, and other excavations,[1] and, although he will not be liable for injuries resulting from the fact that the place of work is made dangerous by the progress of the work itself,[2] he will be liable where the injury results from a danger, outside of the ordinary progress of the work, of which he had, or should have had, knowledge,[3] or where the work is being done under his direction or control or the direction and control of his agent.[4] When an employee has called to the attention of a foreman in charge a dangerous condition and is ordered to work notwithstanding, and injury or death results, recovery may be had against the master.[5] Furthermore a master will be liable for injuries resulting from "cave ins" due to conditions which the master knew, or which in the exercise of reasonable care he should have discovered,[6] but not where he has furnished suitable materials for bracing.[7]

d. Blasting

A master must use ordinary care in regulating the time and manner in which his employees conduct their blasting operations, and must furnish reasonably safe appliances for such work.

A master who fails to use ordinary care in regulating the time and manner in which the employees shall fire their blasts is liable for injuries sustained through his negligently allowing them to fire them so as to cause injuries to his employees.[8] Likewise he will be liable for negligence in not furnishing reasonably safe appliances for such work.[9] The rule does not apply, however, where the cause of injury is not furnished by the master who is not charged with the duty of providing it,[10] where the alleged defective implements were of a simple character and furnished to an experienced employee at his request and accepted by him without complaint,[11] or where the injury resulted from negligence in respect of a duty clearly and unequivocally put by the statute on the miner, the workman, or shot firer who was exploding the shots.[12] A mine owner supplying dynamite for use in blasting must exercise reasonable care commensurate with a known danger to store it so as not to cause injury to his employees.[13]

gaged in a work requiring blasting, and a hole, of several fired by one shift, fails to explode, leaving a missed hole charged with an explosive, the danger arising therefrom to the members of another shift is one which it is the duty of the master to make known to the servants, and for failure to do so he will be liable for injuries resulting therefrom,[14] but he will not be liable where the injured employee was engaged in the duty of looking for such unexploded blasts and carrying the explosive to a place of safety,[15] or where it does not appear that the explosive was put there by an employee of the operator and where it might have been left by a stranger.[16] It has also been held that the rule that the master must furnish the servant a reasonably safe place to work is subject to the qualification that regard must be had to the dangerous character of mining, where the use of dynamite, being necessarily dangerous, depends somewhat on the care taken by the servant,[17] and this is particularly true where the injured employee was, at the time of the accident, engaged in drilling out an unexploded blast.[18]

§ 223. —— Electrical Apparatus and Structures

Where a master employs electricity in his business, he must exercise every reasonable precaution to protect his servants from injury.

Where a master employs electricity in his business, he must exercise every reasonable precaution known to those possessed of the knowledge requisite for the safe treatment of electricity to protect his servants from injury,[19] and must see to it that his poles and other places for work are in a reasonably safe condition.[20] As in other cases, however, the master is not required to adopt a new device merely because it is new, where its practical utility has not been demonstrated.[21]

§ 224. —— Shipping

The rules as to furnishing safe tools and appliances and a safe place to work apply to shipowners and others employing labor on or about vessels.

Shipowners and others employing labor on or about vessels are bound to the same rule of care with respect to furnishing their servants with reasonably

Gross negligence

Owner of coal mine and foremen were guilty of gross negligence in permitting high voltage electric wires to dangle from roof of air course, the track in which was used to spot empty and loaded cars, with respect to liability for death of miner who was electrocuted while switching loaded car onto air course track pursuant to order of foreman.—West Kentucky Coal Co. v. Hazardous work

(1) Under a statute classifying all work in construction, alteration, or repair of pole lines for telegraph, telephone, or other purposes as hazardous, work on a steel frame supporting electric transmission line is work in construction of "pole lines" within the statute.—Inspiration Consol. Copper Co. v. Bryan, 252 P. 1012, 31 Ariz. 302.

(2) Injuries suffered by lineman while trimming trees for proposed electrical transmission line, which work was as hazardous as climbing poles and which was part of the work of construction, were due to a condition or conditions of employment.—Salt River Valley Water Users' Ass'n v. Wheeler, 236 P. 1108, 28 Ariz. 350.

Machinery and appliances

(1) If employer sets employees to work on or near a machine, with the concealed danger of its becoming charged with current of electricity which, in exercise of reasonable care, he ought to have made safe, even if machine is perfect in mechanism, but if unsuitable and unsafe, and employer in exercise of reasonable care ought to have known it, it is no defense to show that same kind of machines are commonly used in work similar to his.—Lamberti v. Neal, 148 N.E. 463, 253 Mass. 99.

(2) Employer could not disclaim liability for employee's death caused by explosion of electrical apparatus used to pump gasoline on ground that employer could not foresee presence of explosive vapor in pump which caused explosion where evidence established necessity of priming pump by flowing gasoline into pipe, which employee did.—Neiss v. § 225. Railroads

The application of the rules governing appliances or places furnished by, or in the control of, third persons to the operation of railroads is discussed supra § 212.

§ 226. —— Degree of Care Required

a. In general

b. Rule as affected by statute

a. In General

A railroad company is required to exercise such reasonable care for the safety of its servants as the nature of, and the dangers incident to, its business require.

A railroad company is not an insurer of the safety of its employees,[31] and, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, is required to exercise only such reasonable care for the safety of its servants as the nature of, and the dangers incident to, its business require,[32] and is not liable in the absence of negli-

Where car repairer employed by railroad company was being conveyed to scene of wreck, company owed him duty of exercising ordinary care to furnish reasonably safe transportation to and from such place, as well as safe means of ingress to, and egress from car in which he was conveyed.—Cannell v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., Mo.App., 277 S.W. 583.

Train operations in terminal

Running of trains upon network of tracks in and about a union station is complex business, dangerous to employees if not properly conducted, and therefore it is incumbent on terminal corporation to adopt all reasonable measures to avoid subjecting its employees to unnecessary dangers.—Terminal R. Ass'n of St. Louis v. Farris, C.C.A.Mo., 69 F.2d 779.

Climatic conditions; snow and ice

(1) The general rule is that a railroad company is not liable to its employees for injuries resulting from climatic conditions, such as snow and ice.

condition,[41] taking into consideration the nature of the work.[42] On the other hand, no duty rests on a railroad company to provide absolutely a safe place to work,[43] and it is not held to an absolute responsibility for the reasonably safe condition of the place,[44] and it is not an insurer of the safety of the place for work.[45]

A railroad company has also been held to have the duty of using ordinary or reasonable care,[46] although not the absolute duty[47] or responsibility[48] to furnish reasonably safe tools and appliances for the use of its employees and to maintain them in a reasonably safe condition.[49] It has also been held that railroad companies are bound to avail themselves of all new inventions and improvements known to them, whenever their utility has been thoroughly tested and demonstrated.[50]

A shipper owes its employee the duty of using ordinary care to provide him with a reasonably safe place in which to perform his work of unloading a box car.[51]

Company not insurer
At common law a railroad company is not an insurer of the safety of tools, equipment, and appliances.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Wilmouth, 153 S.E. 874, 154 Va. 582, certiorari denied Wilmouth v. Southern Ry. Corporation, 51 S.Ct. 81, 282 U.S. 878, 75 L.Ed. 775.

Goggles
Railroad was under duty to furnish shop machinist with goggles, if foreman's instructions or railroad's rules required use of hammer and chisel in tightening nut; railroad fulfilled duty by keeping them at place where such articles were usually kept for employees' use.—St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. of Texas v. Weatherly, Tex.Civ.App., 2 S.W.2d 555.

Motor car
A railroad company employing man to travel along its tracks within designated district and keep company's signs adjacent to tracks freshly painted owed duty to supply him with motor car reasonably suitable and safe for operation in usual manner.—Metz v. Southern Pac. Co., 124 P.2d 670, 51 Cal.App.2d 260.

Rule requiring inspection
Where it was shown to be impracticable for a brakeman to inspect appliances at every stop, defendant could not, by adopting such a rule, relieve itself from liability for failure to furnish safe appliances.—Karns v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 123 P. 758, 87 Kan. 154, L.R.A. 1916D 1042.

Detector bar
Railroad was not shown to be negligent in not equipping interlocking system at railroad intersections with a detector bar, where there was no showing that device was in general use or that plaintiff would not have been injured in any event while operating derail lever.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Berry, 272 S.W. 6, 208 Ky. 795.

51. Ark.—Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Sampson, 142 S.W.2d 221, 200 Ark. 906.

railroad company is required to exercise reasonable or ordinary care, for the safety of its employees, in view of all the circumstances,[52] and its duty of care becomes even greater as the risk increases;[53] but it is not required to anticipate and guard against every possible danger which may befall its employees,[54] but only such as are likely to occur and as, by the exercise of reasonable care, it could foresee and anticipate.[55] However, under a statute imposing an absolute duty on the company, ordinary care is not sufficient.[56]

As far as concerns the duty of an employer to furnish a safe place in which to work, the interpretation of the Federal Employers Liability Act is derived from, and is consistent with, the general common law.[57] Under the act it has been variously held that a railroad company has the duty to provide a reasonably[58] safe place for work,[59] and the duty of

Dangerous work or place

Facts that work performed is dangerous or is performed in dangerous place, and injury results, do not necessarily show negligence by railroad company.—Morey v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 133 A. 92, 125 Me. 272.

Objects on premises

Duty of employer, under Federal Employers' Liability Act, to employee in respect of objects on the premises where the employee works is the same as the duty owed by landowner to persons employed or invited thereon, or the duty of a proprietor to invited guests.—Waller v. Dangers to be removed

This rule does not mean that the company must remove all possible danger, but all such danger as it can remove or guard against by the exercise of reasonable care.—Pauly v. McCarthy, 166 P.2d 501, 109 Utah 398, reversed on other grounds 67 S.Ct. 962, 330 U.S. 802, 91 L.Ed. 1261.

Provision and supervision of tracks and cars

Hazard of particular employee

Question of railroad's negligence in failing to furnish member of bridge-painting crew a safe place to work would be considered in light of duty railroad owed to him in the work he was personally assigned to do, and not in light of more hazardous work which other members of crew were required to do.—Morton v. Alton R. Co., Mo.App., 118 S.W.2d 59.

Inhalation of gas in pit under track

Action against railroad by hostler for damage to his health allegedly caused by inhalation of carbon monoxide gas from smoldering cinders while in pit under track working on locomotive came under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. McCoy, 110 S.W.2d 433, 270 Ky. 603.

"Engineering necessity"

(1) The doctrine of "engineering necessity," that carriers have much freedom in providing facilities and places for the use of their employees, and that where they are established in accordance with reasonable and scientific judgment, they are not subject to review by a jury, relates only to a condition of fact and not to a rule of law, and neither statute nor common law forbids a trier of fact to try a question of negligence involved between master and servant, merely because there may be involved a matter of engineering; before a matter may be considered an engineering problem, beyond the reach of court and jury, it must appear that there existed a necessity therefor and that the things done could not reasonably have been done otherwise.—Southern Pac. Co. v. Huyck, 128 P.2d 849, 61 Nev. 365.

Station platform

(1) A railroad company is not required to maintain a station platform in the safest and best possible condition.
U.S.—Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Aeby, Mo., 48 S.Ct. 177, 275 U.S. 426, 72 L.Ed. 351, mandate conformed to Aeby v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 6 S.W.2d 1115.

Nature of reasonable care
(1) The reasonable care becomes a demand of higher supremacy, but in all cases it is a question of reasonableness of care depending on the danger attending the place or the machinery.
U.S.—Bailey v. Central Vermont Ry., 63 S.Ct. 1062, 319 U.S. 350, 87 L.Ed. 1444, conformed to 35 A.2d 365, 113 Vt. 433.

In fixing the scope of such duty, courts have kept in mind the fact that the work of a railroad is attended with danger, and can be carried on only by means that are hazardous to employees.[71] In this connection a railroad company has been held not to owe its employees as high a degree of care as that due to passengers or others coming on its premises for the transaction of business, in view of the employees' familiarity with the situation and the dangers.[72]

The carrier is not relieved of the duty to furnish a safe place to work by the fact that the employee's work in the place in question is fleeting or infrequent.[73]

Under the act the carrier is also under the duty of using due, ordinary, or reasonable care to furnish its employees with reasonably[74] safe and suitable appliances, equipment, and tools for doing the work,[75] and to maintain them in a reasonably safe condition;[76] but it is not an insurer[77] or a guarantor[78] of the safety of the appliances, equipment, machinery, or tools, and it is not held to an absolute responsibility for the reasonably safe condition of the tools and appliances.[79] The carrier is not required to furnish the latest, best, and safest appliances,[80] or to discard standard appliances, reasonably safe and suitable or efficient, on the discovery of later improvements.[81]

Under a state statute making railroad operators liable for injuries to their employees from any defect or insufficiency, due to their negligence, in appliances, works, or other equipment, the term "appliance" includes all machinery and equipment furnished by the carrier to use in connection with the conduct and management of its business.[82] Where a state statute requiring railroad platforms to be constructed to insure, as far as possible, the safety of employees is indefinite as to the mode of construction, it should be reasonably construed with reference to another section of the statute authorizing notice, so that the carrier is not to be held guilty of violating the statute until it has been notified to make alterations in its platforms.[83]

§ 227. —— Locomotives

a. In general
b. Statutory regulations

a. In General

A railroad company must exercise reasonable care to provide and maintain reasonably safe locomotives.

A railway company is required to exercise reasonable care and diligence to provide and maintain reasonably safe and suitable locomotives;[84] its conduct is to be judged in the light of possible danger.[85] A master, however, has been held not to be liable for injuries resulting from a defect in a locomotive developing while on the run when it started in good condition,[86] although, as discussed infra subdivision b (3) of this section, a different holding has been made under the Federal Boiler Inspection Act; and ordinarily the master will be relieved of liability where it has purchased a locomotive of standard type from a reliable manufacturer without knowledge of defects, design, or construction.[87]

Overloading tenders. Where an employee of a railway company is injured by the fall of coal from a locomotive tender which has been improperly loaded, the company has been held to be liable.[88]

(3) Federal Boiler Inspection Act

(1) In General

The provision and maintenance of safe locomotives is regulated by various federal and state statutes.

In addition to the Federal Safety Appliance Act and Boiler Inspection Act, discussed in succeeding subdivisions of this section, the providing and maintaining of reasonably safe and suitable locomotives has been regulated by other federal and state statutes.[89] Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act a railroad company is liable for injury to an employee resulting from a defect or insufficiency due to its negligence in its engines and appliances.[90]

Under some authorities neither the Boiler Inspection Act, the Safety Appliance Act, nor the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission absolutely limit the carrier's liability to a violation of them alone, and negligence may be predicated on other conditions, and if the conditions constitute negligence the employee may recover;[91] but there is also authority to the contrary.[92]

(2) Federal Safety Appliance Acts

The duty under the Federal Safety Appliance Acts, as affecting locomotives, to provide and keep in safe condition the appliances specified in the acts, is an absolute and continuing one. Liability under the act does not depend on negligence.

Under the Federal Safety Appliance Acts, 45 U.S. C.A. § 1 et seq, as affecting locomotive appliances and equipment, there is imposed on common carriers, while engaged in interstate commerce, an absolute and continuing duty to provide, and keep in proper and safe condition at all times and in all circumstances, the appliances specified in the acts,[93] as dis-

Fire preventives; personal injuries
(1) Statute making railroad liable for damage resulting from fire set by locomotive is limited to property damage and has no application to bodily injuries, such as injuries to railroad employee.—Hayes v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 186 S.W.2d 780, 208 Ark. 370.

(2) State statute requiring railroads to place spark arresters on top of the chimneys of engines was enacted to prevent injuries resulting from sparks of fire, and was not intended to apply to cinders small enough to enter the human eye.—Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Baxter, 110 S.W. 248, 33 Ky.L. 305, 18 L.R.A.,N.S., 241.

39 C.J. p 381 note 30.

Where snow accumulated on footboard of switch engine on which there were tools which could be used to remove snow and ice, and footboard was cleared at one time by a switchman, but snow and ice again accumulated, railroad could not be held liable under Federal Employers' Liability Act for death of switch foreman resulting from injuries sustained in fall caused by slipping on the icy footboard on theory that railroad failed to provide reasonably safe place in which to work by allowing ice to accumulate on footboard, and failed to furnish proper equipment and material to remove snow and ice.—McGivern v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., C.C.A.Minn., 132 F. 2d 213.

Lights; headlights
(1) Where engine was not connected with gondola or other cars at time of injury, although it had spotted them a short time before, failure of railroad to have headlight on was not negligence with respect to liability of railroad for death of brakeman who slipped from sill of gondola car on which there was a light covering of snow.—Raudenbush v. Baltimore & O. R. R., D.C.Pa., 63 F.Supp. 329.

(2) An auxiliary tender, attached to locomotive tender for purpose of furnishing water, was integral part of complete locomotive, so as to render federal statute and Interstate Commerce Commission's rule, requiring light on locomotive at night, applicable to such tender.—Speiring v. Chicago & E. I. R. Co., 60 N.E.2d 267, 325 Ill.App. 576.

(3) Switch engine, striking brakeman of pick-up freight train while backing to pick up cars to be coupled thereto, was not road service locomotive, picking up detached portion of its train, or making terminal movement, within Interstate Commerce Commission's rule as to rear headlights on backing road service locomotives not so engaged, but yard service locomotive, within rule requiring front and rear lights thereon.—Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Wood, C.C.A.Ohio, 59 F.2d 1017, certiorari denied 53 S.Ct. 92, 287 U.S. 646, 77 L.Ed. 559.

(4) The company is not relieved of the charge of negligence in operating its locomotives without a headlight by a provision in a penal statute that, when a headlight becomes defective, the locomotive may be operated until it reaches its destination.—Salabrin v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 160 N.W. 552, 194 Mich. 458—39 C.J. p 381 note 31.

Failure to keep lamp burning
Even if engine in yard service was equipped with lamps on front and rear in good condition, in compliance with Boiler Inspection Act, failure of railroad's servants to keep lamp burning as engine proceeded at night constituted negligence rendering railroad liable under Federal Employers' Liability Act for resulting injury sustained by switchman. —Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Rich, C.C.A.Ohio, 81 F.2d 584, certiorari denied 56 S.Ct. 955, 298 U.S. 684, 80 L.Ed. 1404.

tinguished from the qualified duty at common law to use ordinary care;[94] and a carrier failing in the performance of that duty cannot escape liability by showing that it exercised reasonable care and diligence in providing and maintaining the safety appliances.[95] Accordingly liability under the act does not depend on negligence.[96] On the other hand, the act does not contemplate that railroad engines shall be so equipped as to eliminate all danger of employees being hurt;[97] and the mere fact of the injury of an employee does not of itself mean that the act has been violated.[98]

The act must be construed liberally[99] and together with the Federal Employers' Liability Act;[1] and in an action brought under the latter act it has been held that recovery may be had for injuries caused by failure to comply with the Safety Appliance Act.[2]

Compliance with a duty imposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission pursuant to the act cannot be said to constitute negligence.[3]

(3) Federal Boiler Inspection Act

The duty to comply with the requirements of the Federal Boiler Inspection Act with respect to the safety of locomotives and their appurtenances is absolute, and liability thereunder is not based on negligence.

The section of the Federal Safety Appliance Acts known as the Boiler Inspection Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 23, making it unlawful for any carrier to use, or permit to be used, on its line any locomotive unless it, its boiler, tender, and all parts and appurtenances thereof are in proper condition and safe to operate in the service to which they are put, without unnecessary peril to life or limb, was enacted to promote the safety and protection of railroad employees and others.[4] It has been held that the Boiler Inspec-

A "locomotive" and a "car" are not the same for all the purposes of the Safety Appliance Acts.—Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Beltz, C.C.A.N.Y., 10 F.2d 74, certiorari denied 46 S.Ct. 205, 270 U.S. 641, 70 L.Ed. 775.

Automatic couplers
(1) Locomotives are within the phrase "any car" in the provision of the Federal Safety Appliance Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 2 et seq., prohibiting common carriers from using in moving interstate traffic any car not equipped with couplers coupling automatically by impact and capable of being uncoupled without the necessity of men going between the ends of the cars.
U.S.—Johnson v. Southern Pac. Co., Utah, 25 S.Ct. 158, 196 U.S. 1, 49 L.Ed. 363.
Mass.—Crowe v. Boston & M. R. R. Co., 136 N.E. 189, 242 Mass. 389.
(2) However, the act does not require an automatic coupler between a locomotive and its tender, which are a single thing, never separated in their ordinary and essential use, and the act is satisfied if there is an automatic coupler at the rear end of the tender.—Pennell v. Philadelphia & Reading R. Co., Pa., 34 S.Ct. 220, 231 U.S. 675, 58 L.Ed. 430.

Switch engine engaged in movement of interstate commerce is locomotive engine which, under act, must be equipped with nondefective power driving-wheel brake.—Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co. v. Herron, 55 P.2d 95, 176 Okl. 162.

Gasoline engine or tractor used in yards for switching and frequently hauling long lines of cars was within Safety Appliance Act requiring power driving-wheel brake on locomotives and similar vehicles.—Hoffman v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 74 F.2d 227, certiorari denied New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Hoffman, 55 S.Ct. 513, 294 U.S. 715, 79 L.Ed. 1248.

Sill steps
Provision for secure sill steps for railroad employees requires steps furnishing secure footing, and applies to sill steps of engine.—Edwards v. Southern Ry. Co., 184 S.E. 370, 52 Ga.App. 557.

Footboards on tender
Safety Appliance Act and rules of Interstate Commerce Commission do not prescribe footboards at rear end of tender of engine, but only provide manner of construction and application, if footboards are used.—Central Vermont Ry. Co. v. Perry, C.C.A.N.H., 10 F.2d 132.

Drawbar out of line
If locomotive drawbar was four or five inches out of line so as to require brakeman to move it four or five inches to make it couple with freight car, it was not such coupler as act requires.—Hampton v. Des Moines & C. I. R. Co., C.C.A.Iowa, 65 F.2d 899.

Ash pan device on locomotive which a man could operate while standing on ground something over two feet from rails although eighteen inches above his head, and extending out five or six inches over that side of his person next to engine, was held to comply with act making it unlawful to use locomotive not equipped with ash pan which can be dumped or emptied and cleaned without necessity of any employee going under locomotive.—Smithers v. Fort Worth & D. C. Ry. Co., Tex.Com.App., 272 S.W. 764.

Nature of absolute duty
An "absolute" duty, as the term is used in this connection, is one which is not subject to any limitation or condition; it is positive and not dependent, and is unqualified by any conditions or considerations whatsoever.—Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Beltz, C.C.A.N.Y., 10 F.2d 74, 77, certiorari denied 46 S.Ct. 205, 270 U.S. 641, 70 L.Ed. 775.

The carrier's ignorance of the defect does not relieve it of liability under the act.—Scarlett v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 60 P.2d 462, 7 Cal.2d 181, reversed on other grounds Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 57 S. Ct. 541, 300 U.S. 471, 81 L.Ed. 748, rehearing denied 57 S.Ct. 787, 301 U. S. 712, 81 L.Ed. 1365.

Literal compliance
Railway companies must literally comply with the statute.—De Queen & E. R. Co. v. Dye, 58 S.W.2d 955, 187 Ark. 219.

Matter not within province of court or jury

Vehicles covered
Gasoline engine or tractor used in yards for switching and frequently hauling long line of cars was held a locomotive within Boiler Inspection Act and Safety Appliance Act.—Hoffman v. New York, N. whether or not the carrier is at fault.[12] The act, however, does not make the carrier an insurer[13] except with respect to the matters mentioned in the act,[14] and does not contemplate that railroad engines shall be so equipped as to eliminate all danger of employees being hurt;[15] and the mere fact of the injury of an employee does not of itself mean that the act has been violated.[16]

Negligence is not the basis for liability under the act[17] and no question of reasonable or ordinary care on the part of the carrier is involved in a case brought under the act.[18] When there has been a compliance, the statute does not require locomotives and their appurtenances to be kept in perfect condition, but merely that they be in proper and safe condition for the purposes of operating in the service to which they are put,[19] and the carriers are left

Dropping of dirt or coal

In the absence of a defect in an appliance, the act does not impose on a carrier liability for an injury apparently resulting from the dropping of particles of dirt or coal upon the appliance in the course of fixing the boiler.—O'Dea v. Byram, 222 N.W. 519, 176 Minn. 67.

Failure to construct railing around deck of tender, which was not required by Boiler Inspection Act or order of Interstate Commerce Commission and was not used by any other railroad, did not subject brakeman to unnecessary peril or cause top of tender to be in improper condition and unsafe, in violation of act, so as to render railroad liable for death of brakeman falling from tender, notwithstanding construction of doghouse on top of tender for brakeman's use.—Satterlee v. Operation of drain cock Railroad had duty of seeing that drain cock was so fitted to engine that application of manual force in closing it would not pull it loose; drain cock fitted to locomotive so as to invite use of both hands must be so fitted to withstand two-hand pull.—Fredericks v. Erie R. Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 36 F.2d 716.

Grease on handholds

Where the carrier has complied with the statute by providing handholds and maintaining them in good repair, in accordance with the re-free to determine how their boilers[20] and tenders,[21] with their appurtenances,[22] shall be kept in proper condition for use without unnecessary danger.

The act is to be liberally construed[23] in the light of its prime purpose, the protection of employees and others by requiring the use of safe equipment,[24] although this does not mean a construction such as to include cases beyond the plain intent and scope of the act.[25] Whatever in fact is an integral or essential part of a completed locomotive, and all parts or attachments definitely prescribed by lawful order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, are within the statute,[26] but mere experimental devices or gadgets, which do not increase the peril but may prove helpquirement of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the fact that a locomotive tender becomes unsafe because of the presence of grease on the handholds does not render the carrier liable under the statute, even if the presence of the grease was due to negligence.—Ford v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 64 F.2d 342, certiorari denied 52 S. Ct. 405, 285 U.S. 549, 76 L.Ed. 939.

Failure to check water level of boiler

Where water in boiler of engine was low when engine was turned over to hostler and his helper, who did not check water level, and boiler exploded about one half hour thereafter, helper could not recover under act for injuries sustained in explosion, since explosion resulted from working of engine and the inattention of the employees, and no defect or danger inherent in the equipment was involved.—Ehalt v. Water affecting accuracy of water gauge

Where type of water furnished by railroad for use in locomotive boilers causes foaming affecting accuracy of water gauge and causing an unusual exhaustion of water, thereby allowing crown sheet to overheat, resulting in explosion when more water is added, railroad is liable for engineer's resulting death although the boiler and all its appurtenances were otherwise in proper and safe condition.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Wetherington, 16 So.2d 720, 245 Ala. 313.

Absence of gangway chains on locomotive with loose apron, although not actionable fault in itself, was material in deciding whether there was negligence in maintaining loose apron.—Watkins v. Boston & M. R. R., 138 A. 315, 83 N.H. 10.

Misplaced clinker hook

Brakeman's fall from top of tender after stumbling over clinker hook, due to negligent misplacement of hook, would not be caused by violation of the act, so as to render railroad liable for brakeman's death, since the misplacing of the clinker hook did not constitute violation of such act.—Satterlee v. Ice on tender; "clean"

The use of a tender, upon whose top an employee must go in course of his duties, and which is covered with ice, involves unnecessary peril to life or limb, within the act; the Interstate Commerce Commission, in using the word "clean" in promulgating rule providing that top of tender behind fuel space shall be kept clean and a means provided to carry off waste water meant something more than mere manner of construction or mechanical operation, because "clean" does not naturally lend itself to such a limited connotation, but the commission meant a continuing duty of promoting the safety of employees by removing from the top of the tender all extraneous substances which might make standing there hazardous.—Lilly v. Grand Trunk Western R. Co., Ill., 63 S.Ct. 347, 317 U.S. 481, 87 L.Ed. 411.

ful in an emergency, are not within the statute.[27]

Time and place as affecting requirements. The duty imposed on the carrier by the statute is a continuing one;[28] it has the continuous duty to have its locomotives equipped with parts and appurtenances which are safe when in their normal place,[29] and it makes no difference where the unfit condition arises.[30]

Service to which appliance put. The phrase "in the service to which the same are put," in the statute, must, it has been held, be taken to mean the service for which the appliance is designed or to which it is put with the employer's knowledge and acquiescence.[31] Under other authority, while a failure to comply with the statute gives rise to no cause of action in favor of an injured employee unless such failure is a proximate cause of the accident, as discussed infra § 257, where such failure is a proximate cause of the accident the employee can recover even though not engaged at the time in an operation in which the safety appliances are specifically designed to furnish him protection.[32]

Use on carrier's line; repairs. The Boiler Inspection Act has been construed as applying only when the locomotive is in use on the carrier's line or in moving traffic,[33] so as to exclude a locomotive removed from active service for repairs.[34]

Action by Interstate Commerce Commission. A rule adopted by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the exercise of its authority to set standards of compliance with the act acquires the force of law and becomes an integral part of the act;[35] and any violation of the commission's rules or orders in this respect has been held to constitute such a violation

Locomotive "in use;" lights

Locomotive in railroad switchyard, which had been temporarily uncoupled from a string of cars and moved a few feet distant, where it was resting with the expectation that it would shortly be recoupled to cars, was in use in switchyard within meaning of rule requiring each locomotive used in yard service between sunset and sunrise to have head and rear lights of a stipulated power and capacity.—Raudenbush v. of the act as to render the railroad company liable regardless of negligence[36] or to constitute negligence per se.[37] A carrier using equipment approved by the commission cannot be held negligent, under the act, for failure to install equipment not required by it.[38]

The failure of the commission to make a rule or order covering every defective condition or construction within the meaning of the act does not relieve the carrier of the obligation to comply with the statute.[39]

§ 228. —— Cars

a. In general
b. Statutory regulations
c. Improper loading

a. In General

A railroad company must use reasonable care and diligence to provide reasonably safe cars.

It is the duty of a railroad company to use reasonable care and diligence to provide reasonably safe and suitable cars and rolling stock.[40] The rule requiring safe and suitable cars does not apply where defective cars are being removed to the shop for repairs,[41] nor does it apply to an employee whose duty it is to handle cars out of repair.[42]

Hand cars and trucks. The duty of a railroad to use reasonable care to provide reasonably safe and suitable cars and rolling stock includes hand and push cars furnished the employee for use in the business of the company[43] and extends to such cars provided by the company for transporting its employees to and from their homes[44] although the journey is commenced after the usual working day has ceased.[45]

b. Statutory Regulations

(1) In general
(2) Federal Safety Appliance Acts

(1) In General

An absolute duty is imposed on railroad companies, by various statutes, to provide safe cars.

The duty of a railroad company to provide safe and suitable cars and rolling stock imposed under a number of statutes, both federal and state, is an absolute one, and an employee injured by reason of a violation thereof may recover in an action against the employer.[46] The employment of repairmen on

Ladder
Railroad was not negligent in failing to construct ladder at rear end of tender with loop or handle extending above top on left as well as on right side of ladder, so as to be liable for death of brakeman falling from tender, where ladder complied with rule of Interstate Commerce Commission.—Satterlee v. Safe passage for brakemen
(1) In safeguarding its employees from injury, the railroad is bound to use due care to make its cars and their loads reasonably safe for the passage of its brakemen.—Morey v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 142 A. 585, 127 Me. 190.
(2) Where brakeman, accustomed to caboose having small cupola and side railings, fell while attempting to pass from end to end of caboose which had wider cupola and no side railings, which equipment was within interstate commerce commission's requirements, railroad was not liable.—Friermood v. Under Federal Employers' Liability Act
(1) A railroad company is liable for injuries to an employee resulting from a defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars.—Joice v. Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co., Mo., 189 S.W.2d 568, 161 A.L.R. 383—39 C.J. p 384 note 50 [c].
(2) Where brakeman was injured in attempt to alight from slowly moving caboose when he slipped on a worn burlap bag nailed to caboose platform for a mat, railroad could not escape liability for injuries under the so-called simple tool doctrine, since caboose was defective because of presence of mat in its worn condition, and fact that condition could have been easily remedied did not alter the fact that caboose was actually defective due to negligence of railroad.—McCarthy v.

defective cars to repair defects does not violate, but strictly complies with, a statute requiring a railroad company to keep its cars free from defects and safe for use in the operation of its road.[47]

(2) Federal Safety Appliance Acts
(a) In general
(b) Brakes
(c) Couplers

(a) In General

The liability imposed on railroad companies by the Federal Safety Appliance Acts, relating to safety appliances on cars, is absolute and does not depend on the company's negligence. The acts are to be liberally construed to effectuate their purpose of safe-guarding employees.

The Federal Safety Appliance Acts, 45 U.S.C.A. § 1 et seq, relating to safety appliances and equipment on railroad cars and the protection of railroad employees and travelers, have a humanitarian[48] and remedial[49] purpose; they are designed to protect and promote the safety of employees and the public,[50] although primarily to protect employees,[51] and to minimize the dangers of a calling made dangerous in part by defects in the equipment which employees are required to use.[52] They are remedial statutes[53] and are to be construed liberally[54] and

(3) Hauling of defective car and injury to employee does not render railroad liable unless it was negligent.—Wilson v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 5 S.W.2d 19, 319 Mo. 308. Certiorari denied 49 S.Ct. 25, 278 U.S. 622, 73 L.Ed. 543.

Va.—Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Butler, 177 S.E. 195, 163 Va. 626.

Under state employers' liability act, allowing recovery by an employee injured as a result of a defect in the condition of the ways, works, or machinery used by the employer in his business, which had not been discovered or remedied owing to the negligence of the employer or of someone intrusted by him with the duty in that respect, railroad company in possession and control of freight car, used in its work, is liable for injuries to employee because of defect in floor thereof, if discoverable and remediable in exercise of reasonable care.—Griffin v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 181 N.E. 839, 279 Mass. 511.

39 C.J. p 384 note 50 [h].

Automatic or power brakes
Under Code § 2082, prohibiting the running of a train of cars not having a sufficient number of cars with automatic or power brakes enabling the engineer to control the train without requiring brakemen to go between the ends, or on top, of the cars to use the handbrake, the brakes need not, as a matter of law, be coupled up so as to be operated by the engineer, especially where the engine is switching or spotting cars.—Stearns v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 148 N.W. 128, 166 Iowa 566.

Repair of rolling stock
A state statute making railroads liable to injured employees because of negligent handling of cars, or defect or insufficiency in cars or other equipment, includes the repair of rolling stock.

in the light of their remedial purposes,[55] although this does not mean a construction such as to include cases beyond the plain intent and scope of the acts.[56] On the other hand, the acts will not be given an unreasonable construction,[57] or, it has been held, one which makes their requirements impractical or impossible to perform,[58] although other authority holds that impracticability is no defense.[59] The acts do not contemplate that railroad cars shall be so equipped as to eliminate all danger of employees being hurt,[60] and the mere fact of the injury of an employee does not of itself mean that the acts have been violated.[61] The acts are to be construed[62] and applied[63] with the Federal Employers' Liability Act. The standards prescribed by the Safety Appliance Acts must be strictly conformed to, and equivalents or substitutes are not permitted;[64] a literal compliance with the terms of the acts is required.[65]

The duty to comply with the provisions of the acts is absolute and failure to comply renders the company liable to an employee injured by such fail-

Train as unit involved

Where a train is the unit involved in a personal injury action brought by an employee of an interstate railroad, the provisions of the act apply, but if a car is the unit, the act does not apply.—Conrad v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 133 S.W.2d 350, 345 Mo. 335.

Tender; engine

(1) The term "cars" includes tenders.

Mo.—Moore v. St. Joseph & G. I. Ry. Co., 186 S.W. 1035, 268 Mo. 31, affirmed 37 S.Ct. 278, 243 U.S. 311, 61 L.Ed. 741.

(2) While under Safety Appliance Act word "car" or "cars" will be construed to include engine and tender, yet, when wording and context of order or rule of Interstate Commerce Commission indicates otherwise, it will not be so construed.—Satterlee v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., 82 S.W.2d 69, 336 Mo. 943.

"Secure"

(1) The word "secure," as used in the act in the requirement of "secure" equipment of specified character, refers only to the mechanical and structural character of the equipment.—Tobin v. Detroit, T. & I. R. Co., 13 N.E.2d 739, 57 Ohio App. 306.

(2) Thus a light fall of snow upon a sill step does not render it insecure within such requirement.—Raudenbush v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., C.C.A.Pa., 160 F.2d 363—Raudenbush v. Baltimore & O. R. R., D.C. Pa., 65 F.Supp. 6.

(3) Likewise, accumulation of frost thereon did not render running board on tank car insecure.—Tobin v. Detroit, T. & I. R. Co., 13 N.E. 2d 739, 57 Ohio App. 306.

(4) Word "secure" means more than firmly fastened, and means safe for use in purpose for which it is intended.

Maintenance of equipment in dangerous position

The Federal Safety Appliance Acts and Interstate Commerce Commission's regulations standarizing certain railroad equipment cannot be so construed as to authorize maintenance of equipment in position which will destroy safety of employee's place of work by creating unnecessary hazard, as by placing automatic coupler lever on top of end sill of gondola freight car.—Apache Ry. The carrier's ignorance of the defect does not relieve it of liability.—Scarlett v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry., 60 P.2d 462, 7 Cal.2d 181, reversed on other grounds 57 S.Ct. 541, 300 U.S. 471, 81 L.Ed. 748, rehearing denied 57 S.Ct. 787, 301 U.S. 712, 81 L.Ed. 1365.

Handholds; grabirons

(1) Railroad which fails to provide and maintain safe handholds or grabirons on train is liable, under Federal Safety Appliance Act § 4, 45 U.S.C.A. § 4, for damages to employee proximately resulting from such failure.

U.S.—Fort Street Union Depot Co. v. Hillen, C.C.A.Mich., 119 F.2d 307, certiorari denied 62 S.Ct. 82, 314 U.S. 642, 86 L.Ed. 515—Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Kelly, C.C.A. Minn., 74 F.2d 31.

N.H.—Grew v. Boston & M. R. R., 142 A. 707, 83 N.H. 383.

(2) A grabiron on a passenger car is within the requirements of the act, notwithstanding it was attached in a perpendicular position to the side of the steps of the vestibule of the car, since the position and location of the grabiron was immaterial in view of the underlying purpose of the act to safeguard the lives of railroad employees.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Moore, 181 So. 374, 135 Fla. 485, modified on other grounds 186 So. 210, 135 Fla. 485.

(3) The presence of snow and ice on grabirons of freight car is not a violation of the act.—Halloran v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 63 N.E.2d 670, 327 Ill.App. 217.

(4) Wire wrapped around grabiron on railroad car was held no part of grabiron, with respect to railroad's liability for switchman's injuries.—Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Benson, 185 N.E. 244, 352 Ill. 195, certiorari denied Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Benson, 54 S.Ct. 53, 290 U.S. 636, 78 L.Ed. 553.

The absence of a drawhead or end sill is a violation of the act.—Ward v. Erie R. Co., 129 N.E. 886, 230 N.Y. 230, certiorari denied 41 S.Ct. 536, 256 U.S. 696, 65 L.Ed. 1176.

Draw bars

Draw bars of unloaded freight cars are required by Federal Safety Appliance Act § 5, 45 U.S.C.A. § 5, to be of uniform and standard height; but those of loaded cars need not be of uniform height, provided that they do not vary more than the three inches prescribed as the maximum permitted variation from the standard; the statutory duty imposed on carriers in absolute terms is not discharged by furnishing cars constructed with draw bars of the standard height, and by furnishing to competent inspectors and train men a sufficient number of metallic wedges or shims, to use, as occasion demands, to raise to the legal standard draw bars lowered by the natural effect of proper use.—St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Taylor, Ark., 28 S.Ct. 616, 210 U.S. 281, 52 L.Ed. 1061.

A door handle on a box car is not one of the safety appliances mentioned in the act.—Campbell v. Southern Pac. Co., 250 P. 622, 120 Or. 122.

Enforcement according to common law or state death statute

vided the employee is one of the class for whose benefit the statute was enacted.[68]

Liability under the act is not based, and does not depend, on the carrier's negligence, in the general sense of want of care,[69] and the carrier is not excused by any showing of care, however assiduous;[70] violation of the acts has been said to constitute negligence[71] or negligence per se[72] for which recovery may be had under the Federal Employers' Liability Act.[73] The liability does not arise from the carrier's common-law duties growing out of the relation of master and servant[74] nor does it depend on the carrier's general duty to exercise ordinary

Effect of Federal Employers' Liability Act

An injured employee's right to recover under the Federal Safety Appliance Act is not affected by the subsequent passage of the Federal Employers' Liability Act, since the latter provides that nothing therein shall be held to impair the rights of employees under other acts of congress.—Grew v. Boston & M. R. R., 142 A. 707, 83 N.H. 383.

Beneficiaries other than primary

The fact that certain classes of persons were intended to be primarily protected by the discharge of such statutory duty will not necessarily prevent others, neither named nor intended as primary beneficiaries, from maintaining an action to recover for injuries caused by a violation of such legislative command.—Fort Street Union Depot Co. v. "Due to its negligence"

The clause in the Federal Employers' Liability Act, "due to its negligence," must be construed to mean that congress intended to treat a violation of the Safety Appliance Acts as negligence per se.—McAllister v. St. Louis Merchants' Bridge Terminal Ry. Co., 25 S.W.2d 791, 324 Mo. 1005.

care for the safety of its employees.[75]

The fact that the employee at time of the injury was acting in violation of orders[76] or of rules prescribed by the carrier,[77] or was himself negligent,[78] does not preclude him from claiming the benefit of the statute.

The test of the carrier's duty under the acts is the performance of the appliances.[79] Although the equipment of cars complies with the statute, if the carrier so operates the cars that the appliances cannot be used without doing the thing which the acts seek to avoid it violates the statutes as fully as though it had failed to install the appliances.[80]

Service to which appliance put. While, as discussed infra § 258, a violation of the statutes gives rise to no cause of action in favor of an injured employee unless it occasions or contributes to the injury, where the failure to comply with the requirements of the acts is a proximate cause of the accident, or a material factor in causing it, the employee may recover, although not engaged at the time in an operation in which the safety appliances are specifically designed to furnish him protection,[81] nor is it necessary that the injured person be using the defective device.[82] So, although it is provided that the requirement with respect to grabirons and handholds is "for greater security to men in coupling and uncoupling cars," an employee may nevertheless recover for injuries resulting from such defective appliances although at the time he was not engaged in coupling or uncoupling cars.[83]

Car as "used" or "in use;" repairs. In the determination of the applicability of the Federal Safety Appliance Acts, cars, in particular circumstances, have been held to be "used" or "in use."[84] Although the statute relieves the carrier from the statutory penalty while a car is being hauled to the nearest available point for repairs, it is still liable to a civil action by its employees for injuries received, by reason of the defective equipment, while the car is being so hauled;[85] but the statute does not apply

(1) Where train broke apart on bridge because of defective coupling, and brakeman, in attempting repairs so that train could proceed, fell from bridge and was injured, such defective car was still "in use" at time of injury, within act.—Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. Co. v. Goneau, Minn., 46 S.Ct. 129, 269 U.S. 406, 70 L.Ed. 335.

(2) A car with a defective coupler, which was billed for the repair shop, but which was not sent there but was left on a track in ordinary use in a switch yard, to be repaired by the switchmen and then coupled to other cars, was being "used," within the meaning of the statute.—Erie R. Co. v. Russell, C.C.A.N.Y., 183 F. 722, 106 C.C.A. 160, certiorari denied 31 S.Ct. 722, 220 U.S. 607, 55 L.Ed. 607.

Car not withdrawn from service

Convenience in repairing

(1) Under act repairs to defective couplers must be made on the spot, if possible, and if so it is unlawful to move the car.—Lorick v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 93 S.E. 332, 108 S.C. 100.

(2) Where car having a broken coupler could reasonably have been repaired where it stood on a switch track, the mere fact that it could be repaired more conveniently at another place did not justify its being moved in its defective condition.—Chicago Junction Ry. Co. v. King, Ill., 169 F. 372, 94 C.C.A. 652, affirmed 32 S.Ct. 79, 222 U.S. 222, 56 L.Ed. 173.

Exclusion from commercial use; intra-state train

While a railroad may move empty cars by themselves to repair shops for the purpose of having them where withdrawal of the car from service for repair has been completed and the car is in course of repair,[86] since such a car is not "in use" within the act.[87] A brakeman attempting repairs to a train, which broke apart because of defective coupling, so that the train could proceed has been held engaged in coupling, and not in repair work, within the statute.[88]

Scope of acts; intra-state commerce. The statutes embrace all locomotives, cars, and similar vehicles used on any railway that is a highway of interstate commerce, and is not confined exclusively to vehicles engaged in such commerce;[89] thus an employee of a carrier which conducts and carries interstate traffic over its railway has a right of action under the statutes although he was engaged, at the time of the injury, in intra-state, and not interstate, commerce.[90] However, it has been held that, where the Federal Employers' Liability Act is invoked as the basis of liability, it must be shown that the employer is a common carrier by railroad engaged in interstate commerce and that the injury to the employee came while he was employed by the carrier in such commerce;[91] but where jurisdiction placed in condition to comply with the safety appliance acts without being guilty of a violation of those acts, yet in so moving them for the purpose of repair they must, in order not to be subject to the acts, be wholly excluded from commercial use themselves, and from connection with other vehicles which are commercially employed; cars being hauled to a place of repair in a purely intra-state train, composed only of such cars, or while on a repair track out of all connection with vehicles in commercial use, are not subject to acts.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Snyder, C.C.A.Tenn., 187 F. 492, 109 C.C.A. 344.

Removal of safety appliances to effect repairs
After freight car reached repair place and was out of service, carrier could take off handhold or any other safety appliance necessary to effect repairs, without violating act.—New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Kelly, C.C.A.Ind., 70 F.2d 548, certiorari denied Kelly v. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co., 55 S.Ct. 110, 293 U.S. 595, 79 L.Ed. 689.

.s acquired under the Employers' Liability Act the employee may recover, on showing negligence, without showing a violation of the Safety Appliance Acts.[92]

Action by Interstate Commerce Commission. An appliance on a car which complies with the regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission, made in pursuance of the Federal Safety Appliance Acts, is not defective;[93] a railroad company which strictly complies with such regulations has discharged its full duty as far as the requirements of the acts with respect to that appliance are concerned,[94] and the judgment of a trial court or a jury cannot be substituted for that of the commission.[95] On the other hand, the failure of a railway company engaged in interstate commerce to equip and maintain its cars as required by a rule of the commission, in pursuance of the authority conferred on it by the act, amounts to a violation of both the rule and the statute.[96]

Such rules of the commission should be liberally construed for the purpose of relieving trainmen of danger.[97] However, orders of the commission issued in excess of, or without, authorization by the statute do not become part of the law[98] even though generally complied with,[99] and compliance with such an order does not relieve the railroad company from liability for resulting injuries to employees.[1]

Where the commission has not made a rule with respect to a particular matter, the test as to the carrier's liability is whether the appliance is safe or secure within the meaning of the statute.[2]

(b) Brakes

The requirements of the Federal Safety Appliance Act as to hand and power brakes on railroad cars are absolute, and liability for noncompliance does not depend on negligence.

The prohibition in the Federal Safety Appliance Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 11, against the use, by a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce by railroad, of any car not equipped with efficient hand brakes is absolute and unqualified,[3] regardless of any caus-

Standardization by commission under statute

Provision of act requiring secure ladders and other equipment was operative pending action by commission under succeeding provision that safety appliances should conform to standard prescribed by commission, and in the interim prescribed absolute duty of making ladders and other appliances secure, but succeeding provision relating to standardization contemplated that appliances should be standardized by commission.—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Scarlett, Cal., 57 S.Ct. 541, 300 U.S. 471, 81 L.Ed. 748, rehearing denied 57 S.Ct. 787, 301 U.S. 712, 81 L.Ed. 1365—Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Williams, Miss., 37 S.Ct. 128, 242 U.S. 462, 61 L.Ed. 437.

Ladder; brace rod

The rule stated in the text applies to a ladder; but a round brace running diagonally across the side of the car and beneath a ladder does not constitute a part of the ladder within the statute, but is a separate and distinct contrivance, designed and used for an entirely separate purpose, and whether the proximity of the two gives a right of recovery is determined by the common-law rule of negligence, and not by the inflexible rule of the statute.—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Scarlett, Cal., 57 S.Ct. 541, 300 U.S. 471, 81 L.Ed. 748, rehearing denied 57 S.Ct. 787, 301 U.S. 712, 81 L.Ed. 1365.

Coupling levers

The commission's order, providing generally for placing of uncoupling levers either on top of, at end of, or underneath sills of freight cars did not justify company in placing such a lever on tops of gondola car's end sill, so as to create hazardous footing for brakemen required to use such sill, even if commission had power to standardize such levers, and maintenance of lever in such place constituted actionable negligence rendering company liable for resulting death of brakeman.—Apache Ry. Purpose of provision

(1) The purpose of the provision is to increase the protection of operating trainmen to an extent beyond that furnished by the common law, and to supplant the qualified duty of the common law with an absolute duty, deemed more just.—Spotts v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., C.C.A.Ind., 102 F.2d 160, certiorari denied Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Spotts, 59 S.Ct. 1039, 307 U.S. 641, 83 L.Ed. 1522.

(2) The obvious purpose of the es or reasons for its not being so equipped.[4] The railroad company has the absolute and mandatory obligation to comply with the requirement both in equipping a car with efficient hand brakes[5] and in maintaining such brakes for its employees' use,[6] and is liable for the damages suffered by an employee by reason of inefficient brakes.[7] There is no provision in the statute for any excuse for not so doing,[8] and the company's negligence[9] or reasonable care[10] is immaterial, since its liability is not founded on neglaw was to provide safety for trainmen by having efficient brakes when they were lawfully and dutifully touched or taken hold of in furtherance of the operation of the car.—Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Howell, C.C.A.N.Y., 6 F.2d 784.

"Efficient" defined; test

(1) The word "efficient," as used in the act, means adequate in performance, producing properly a desired effect; and "inefficient" means not producing or not capable of producing the desired effect; incapable; incompetent; inadequate.—Myers v. Reading Co., Pa., 67 S.Ct. 1334, 331 U.S. 477, 91 L.Ed. 1615—Spotts v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., C.C.A.Ind., 102 F.2d 160, certiorari denied Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Spotts, 59 S.Ct. 1039, 307 U.S. 641, 83 L.Ed. 1522.

(2) The act fixes no standard by which the efficiency of brakes may be measured.

Ga.—Western & A. R. R. v. Meister, 140 S.E. 905, 37 Ga.App. 570.

(3) Test of whether hand brake is efficient, as required by act, is its ability to produce expected results when properly applied.—Anderson v. Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co., 186 N.E. 185, 352 Ill. 561, and certiorari denied Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Anderson, 54 S.Ct. 93, 290 U.S. 675, 78 L.Ed. 583.

(4) The brakes must be so efficient as to hold cars securely under ordinary circumstances.—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 296 P. 645, 112 Cal.App. 7.

(5) Proof of an actual break or visible defect in coupling appliance is not a prerequisite to a finding that the requirement of efficient hand brakes has been violated.—Spotts v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., C.C.A.Ind., 102 F.2d 160, certiorari denied Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Spotts, 59 S.Ct. 1039, 307 U.S. 641, 83 L.Ed. 1522.

Use for purpose intended

Where the giving way of a defective hand brake was the proximate cause of the injury of a brakeman, who took hold of the wheel to assist him in climbing to the top of the car, in course of duty, to release the brake, the fact that he was not using the brake at the time for the purpose for which it was intended did not defeat his right to recovery, since the handling of the brake for the purpose of releasing it was as necessary as setting it.—Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Howell, C.C.A.N.Y., 6 F.2d 784.

8. Ind.—Pennyslvania R. Co. v. Hough, 161 N.E. 705, 88 Ind.App. 601.

10. Mo.—Radler v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., supra.

Discovering and repairing defects

The use of care and diligence by the carrier in discovering and repairing defects in the hand brakes is no defense to an action under the act.—Sallee v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., 12 S.W.2d 476, 321 Mo. 798.

ligence[11] or lack of diligence,[12] although it has also been held that permitting the operation of a car with defective brakes is negligence per se.[13]

In order to comply with the act and the rules promulgated thereunder, it is necessary that the brakes can be operated with safety, and the question is not simply one of their efficiency;[14] however, the act does not make a railroad company the insurer of the safety of employees in operating hand brakes[15] or require brakes necessitating any given number of turns of the brake wheel.[16]

The requirement in the Federal Safety Appliance Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 1, of power or train brakes such that the engineer can control the speed of the train without requiring brakemen to use the common hand brake for that purpose is absolute and imperative,[17] and the duty to have the brake appliances in proper working condition is likewise absolute;[18] but the requirement does not apply to switching operations in railroad yards and terminals.[19]

The provision of the Federal Safety Appliance Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 9, that whenever, as provided in other sections, any train is operated with power or train brakes not less than a specified per cent of the cars in such train shall have their brakes used and operated by the engineer of the locomotive drawing the train is not limited in its application to operations on main-line tracks.[20] A moving locomotive with cars attached is outside the provision only when it is not a train, as where the operation is that of switching, classifying, and assembling cars within railroad yards for the purpose of making up trains.[21]

Action by Interstate Commerce Commission. In order to recover for a violation of the statutory requirement as to hand brakes, plaintiff need not show the violation of any rule of the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to such brakes;[22] and compliance with the orders of the commission will not necessarily constitute a compliance with the statute.[23] The commission's approval of a particular brake mechanism cannot be inferred from the fact that it has been in common use on various railroads for a number of years and that the commission has made no rule or regulation concerning it.[24]

(c) Couplers

The requirement of automatic couplers under the Federal Safety Appliance Acts is absolute and liability for noncompliance does not depend on negligence. The test of compliance is the operating efficiency of the couplers with which cars are equipped.

The observance of reasonable regulations promulgated by that authority would in every case be the minimum of what the railroad should do within the law, but might not be the maximum; the commission could not require less than "efficient hand brakes."—Western & A. R. R. v. Meister, supra.

Order to comply with statute
A railroad could not escape liability on ground that order of commission providing for the kind of hand brakes that might be used on cars was in effect an approval of brake complained of, where order was merely a direction to comply with the Safety Appliance Act requiring an "efficient hand brake."—Spotts v. Purpose of act

(1) The purpose of the provision was to eliminate evils attending old-fashioned link and pin coupling, where it was necessary for men to go between the ends of cars to couple and uncouple them, and where the cars, when coupled to a train, sometimes separated by reason of the insecurity of the coupling.
U.S.—St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Conarty, Ark., 35 S.Ct. 785, 238 U. S. 243, 59 L.Ed. 1290.

(2) The evil sought to be eliminated by the act was necessity of workmen going between cars, and especially for purpose of coupling or uncoupling them.—Crabtree v. Kurn, 173 S.W.2d 851, 351 Mo. 628.

The common-law duty of due care is changed to that of an absolute duty in this respect.—Alabama Great Southern Ry. Co. v. Cornett, 106 So. 242, 214 Ala. 23.

Operation in reasonable and proper manner

Act imposes on railroad absolute duty to equip cars used in interstate commerce with automatic couplers which will function without necessity of men going between cars when operated in ordinary, reasonable, and proper manner.

Coupling and uncoupling included

(1) The protection of the act extends to men when coupling, as well as when uncoupling, cars.

Va.—Southern R. Co. v. Simmons, 55 S.E. 459, 105 Va. 651.

(2) The provision extends to the act of preparing the coupler for the impact by which it is operated.—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Keddy, C.C.A.Cal., 28 F.2d 952, certiorari denied 49 S.Ct. 351, 279 U.S. 856, 73 L.Ed. 997—Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Voelker, Iowa, 129 F. 522, 65 C.C.A. 226, 70 L.R.A. 264.

Employee not engaged in coupling; adjustment

(1) Railroad employee was entitled to protection of statute although not engaged in coupling or uncoupling cars, if he was engaged in the discharge of his duties.
U.S.—Chicago, M., St. P. & P. R. Co. v. Goldhammer, C.C.A.Minn., 79 F. 2d 272, certiorari denied 56 S.Ct. 382, 296 U.S. 655, 80 L.Ed. 467—Keenan v. Director General of Railroads, C.C.A.N.Y., 285 F. 286, certiorari denied 261 U.S. 616, 43 S.Ct. 361, 67 L.Ed. 828.

N.Y.—Saxton v. Delaware & H. Co., 176 N.E. 425, 256 N.Y. 363.

(2) The protection afforded by the act is not limited to employee injured by colliding cars while actually making coupling, but applies as well to employee injured while between cars for purpose of adjusting coupler in order to effect coupling; switchman, who went between cars in use in interstate commerce, on failure of cars to couple by impact, to adjust coupler, and who was injured when knuckle with broken lip fell, was not engaged in repairing the coupler, and was within protection of act.—Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Tittle, C.C.A.Ohio, 4 F.2d 818, certiorari denied 46 S.Ct. 20, 269 U.S. 558, 70 L.Ed. 410.

(3) But it has also been held that, in order to recover for employee's death on ground of railroad's violation of automatic coupler requirement, deceased must have gone between cars to effect coupling operation.—Geraghty v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 70 F.2d 300.

Lack of knowledge of defects

It is no defense that the car was moved by the carrier without knowledge of defects.—McAllister v. St. Louis Merchants' Bridge Terminal Ry. Co., 25 S.W.2d 791, 324 Mo. 1005.

Use in moving interstate traffic

(1) The words "any car used in moving interstate traffic," used in the act of March 2, 1893, 45 U.S.C.A. § 2, amended by the act of March 2, 1903, c. 976, § 1, 45 U.S.C.A. § 8, in limiting to such cars the obligation to provide automatic couplers, was not to be taken in a narrow sense.—Schlemmer v. Buffalo, R. & assignment or otherwise.[27] A violation of the duty, resulting in an injury to the employee, gives rise to liability,[28] irrespective of actual negligence on the part of the carrier other than failure to comply with the requirements of the act.[29] Such liability is not dependent on lack of reasonable[30] or proper[31] care, nor does the use of ordinary or reasonable care or diligence in furnishing, repairing, or inspecting couplers discharge the duty or relieve carriers of liability for nonperformance.[32] A violation of the act has been held to constitute negligence[33] or negligence per se[34] within the Federal Employers' Lia-

(2) Where there were no defects in appliances and ordinarily coal car and engine could have been uncoupled with appliances at hand and without necessity of brakeman's being between car and engine, but during a flying switch it was duty of brakeman to uncouple cars and he could not reasonably do so, with appliances available, without necessity of his being between car and engine, there was a violation of act; no imperfection in appliances was needed to create hazard imposing liability, since the operation itself implied a violation of the act.—Crabtree v. Kurn, 173 S.W.2d 851, 351 Mo. 628.

Train made up and held in place

Where train was made up and was being held in place by brakes controlled from locomotive, it was past time for train to have departed, and defective brake coupling was the cause of injuries sustained by car inspector while examining cars for defects in airbrake system, the provisions of the act were applicable.—Conrad v. bility Act, or negligence as a matter of law.[35]

A failure to keep the required couplers in proper working order or operative condition at all times is a violation of the statute,[36] and the test of compliance is the operating efficiency of the couplers with which the car is equipped.[37] The law does not compel the use of any particular type or design of coupler;[38] but a coupler which cannot perform its function does not measure up to the statutory standard[39] and it is immaterial whether the defect is in the coupler itself or in adjuncts without which it cannot operate;[40] further, a coupler may be defective within the act without being actually broken or containing a visible defect.[41] It has been said to be the railroad's duty to keep such couplers in such operative condition that they will always perform their functions;[42] but it has also been held that the failure of couplers to couple is not per se a violation of the act[43] and that the failure of couplers to couple on impact on a given occasion does not deprive them of their character of "couplers coupling automatically by impact," as the phrase is used in the statute.[44] Thus a railroad has been held to have complied with the law when it equips its cars with couplers, designed to couple automatically by impact, which are in general use among well-regulated railroads[45] and not to be responsible for injury unless the failure of the couplers to couple on a given occasion results from some defect therein.[46]

Tracks laid on curve
The act is violated where the failure to couple automatically is due to the fact that the tracks are so laid on a curve that the couplers will not meet without men going between the cars to adjust them.—Hohenleitner v. Southern Pacific Co., C.C.Or., 177 F. 796.

Couplers operable from side of car
The requirement is sufficiently complied with by providing couplers which could be operated from side of cars, thus avoiding the necessity of going between them.—Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Charlton, Va., 247 F. 34, 159 C.C.A. 252.

(2) Coupler, knuckle of which does not open after application of force sufficient to open it, if coupler is in proper condition, without requiring man to go between cars for purpose, does not meet statutory requirements; facts that freight cars might have been coupled, if knuckles of both couplers were open, and were later coupled, would not relieve railroad company from liability for injuries to switching crew foreman as result of having to go between cars to place knuckles in such position.—Chicago, M., St. P. & P. c. Improper Loading

A railroad company must use reasonable care to see that its cars are properly loaded so as not to cause injury to its employees.

It is the duty of a railway company to use reasonable care to see that its cars are properly loaded so as not to cause injury to its employees[47] and it will be liable even though the injury was caused by the manner in which the car was loaded by the consignor.[48] A rule of the company that no car must go forward which exceeds the clearance dimensions or is loaded in an unsafe manner does not enlarge its legal duty, but is an injunction to employees to observe its legal duty.[49]

§ 229. —— Tracks and Roadbeds

a. In general
b. Blocking frogs, switches, and guard rails
c. Fences and cattle guards
d. Bridges, trestles, and culverts

a. In General

A railroad company's duty to its servants is to use reasonable care in putting and keeping its roadbed and track in reasonably safe condition.

The general rule is that a railway company, as to its servants, is not bound to furnish a safe roadbed and track; its duty in that respect is to use all reasonable care and precaution in putting and keeping the roadbed and track in reasonably safe and good condition, and what constitutes reasonable care must depend on the surroundings, and the dangers to be fairly apprehended and encountered.[50] Under a statute, however, imposing liability on a railroad company for negligence by reason of defects in its track, roadbed, etc., it has been held that the duty rests on the company to furnish its employee a safe place to work with respect to its tracks and right of way, where the performance of his duties necessitates his use thereof.[51] The general rule has no application where the place of work is constantly changing by reason of the work itself or is necessarily incomplete and dangerous;[52] and generally it is sufficient if the tracks and roadbeds were substantial and durable at the time of their construction by competent engineers, and were properly supervised thereafter.[53] If a servant knows of the danger, or it is obvious, he is bound to exercise ordinary care to avoid it.[54]

The courts will not prescribe any particular standard for the spacing or construction of tracks or yards.[55]

55. Mo.—Cooper v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 148 S.W.2d 773, 347

With respect to the application of a statute requiring an employer to provide a safe place of employment, a street car company has no control over a street, and no right to place any obstructions therein, so as to protect a motorman when changing the trolley.[56]

Inequalities and other defects in surface. A railroad company is bound to use reasonable care to keep its roadbed free from such inequalities and other defects in the surface as it may be reasonably anticipated will cause injuries to its employees,[57] but it will not be liable for injuries resulting from defects arising in the progress of an employee's work,[58] or for injuries which could not reasonably have been anticipated when the roadbed is reasonably fitted for the purpose for which it is used.[59] At least within its yard limits, where workmen in considerable numbers are constantly engaged, a railroad company must exercise a degree of care commensurate with the risk to prevent the accumulation of snow or ice in such quantity, form, and location as to be a menace to the safety of its employees working therein.[60]

(1) Fault or negligence of railroad company may not be found from mere existence, between tracks, of drain for draining yard, and fact that employee fell therein; company had much freedom in selecting method of drainage and in choice of facilities and places for use of employees, and courts will not prescribe standards in respect to such matters or leave to juries such engineering questions as are involved in the construction and maintenance of railroad yards and the drainage system therein.—Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Koske, N.J., 49 S.Ct. 202, 279 U.S. 7, 73 L.Ed. 578.

(2) Under the "engineering necessity doctrine," carriers have much freedom of choice in providing facilities and places for the use of their employees, and where they are established in accordance with reasonable and scientific judgment on roadbeds and yards, they are not subject to review by a jury, but it is essential to the application of the doctrine that the facility or place of use of the employees must be suitable for the practical operation of the employer's business.—Southern Pac. Co. v. Huyck, 128 P.2d 849, 61 Nev. 365.

Safe place to work

Rule holding employer to ordinary care to provide his employees a reasonably safe place in which to work does not impose on a railroad company any obligation to adopt or maintain any particular standard for the spacing of its tracks; the railroad does not owe as high a degree of care to an employee, in this connection, as it does to passengers or others coming on its premises on business, since his knowledge of the dangers existing because of the narrow space between the tracks is at least equal to that chargeable against the railroad.—Toledo, St. L. & W. R. Co. v. Allen, Mo., 48 S.Ct. 215, 276 U.S. 165, 72 L.Ed. 513, conformed to Allen v. Toledo, St. L. & W. Ry. Co., Mo., 12 S.W.2d 1116.

Sidetracks. Railroad companies have generally not been held to the same degree of care in maintaining their sidetracks as their main tracks, and not liable for injuries to servants caused by defects in their construction, unless it appears that they are guilty of gross carelessness in handling their cars.[61]

Switches. It is the duty of a railroad company to use reasonable care to furnish and to keep in order, and rightly placed, switches which are free from defects and reasonably safe and suitable for the purpose in view.[62] Where this is done, the company's duty is performed and it is not liable for injuries involving switches sustained by a servant in the performance of his duties.[63] Switches of a form in common use have been held sufficient or proper.[64]

Ties and rails. A railroad operator is bound to use ordinary care to furnish reasonably safe rails and ties and maintain them in such condition,[65] but it is not liable for injuries resulting from accidents due to minor defects not rendering the track unfit for use.[66]

b. Blocking Frogs, Switches, and Guard Rails

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, a railroad company is not negligent in leaving its frogs, switches, or guard rails unblocked, unless blocking is general in that area, or unless it undertakes to maintain blocking and allows it to become defective.

At common law, it is generally held that a railway company is not guilty of negligence in leaving its frogs, switches, or guard rails unblocked,[67] unless blocking is generally used in the same section of the country,[68] or unless the company undertakes to maintain blocking and allows it to become defective.[69] As the object of blocking is only to prevent the feet from catching, a servant cannot recover for injuries received by reason of his arm's catching in an unblocked guard rail.[70]

bank of snow and ice and slid under the train, railroad was held not negligent in allowing accumulation of snow and ice along tracks at that point, where it was not near any station or yard, and deceased had no duties to perform on ground along track.—Burtis v. Freeman, 235 P. 342, 77 Colo. 120.

bility under such statutes is generally held not to be absolute and there can be no recovery unless the violation was the cause of the injury,[72] and an employee cannot recover when he was acting in violation of the rules of the company at the time the injuries were sustained.[73] Some statutes apply only to railroad corporations,[74] while the application of others is not confined to common carriers, but extends to railroads used in connection with mills and logging companies.[75]

c. Fences and Cattle Guards

A railroad company has no common-law duty to its employees to fence its track and provide cattle guards.

As between a railway company and its employees, there is no common-law duty on the company to fence its track and provide cattle guards.[76] Where, however, a company has fenced its right of way, thereby creating changed conditions which enter into and affect the work done by its employees to operate its trains, the degree of care required on the part of an engineer to avoid animals on the track is different from that required where there is no fence, and the failure of the company to exercise ordinary care and maintain such fence in a proper and safe condition will constitute actionable negligence,[77] although the fact that a railroad has voluntarily fenced a part of its track does not impose on it the obligation to fence more of it.[78] Furthermore, an employee may recover for an injury resulting from the defective construction of such guards or from the negligence of the company in improperly locating them.[79]

Under some decisions, since statutes requiring railroad companies to fence their tracks and erect cattle guards are primarily for the protection of stock, a company is not liable to its servants for injuries received by reason of a failure to comply with the statutory requirements,[80] while under the terms of others it has been held that the intent is to afford protection to employees as well as to animals.[81] It has also been held that where, under a statutory requirement, the company has erected a guard at a point where its employees are constantly compelled to be in the course of their employment, the guard must be made reasonably safe for that purpose, it not being enough that it be made sufficient and safe to turn stock, and an employee may recover for injuries accruing from negligence of the company in locating or constructing such a guard.[82] The mere fact that such guards had been constructed at places not required by the statute does not constitute negligence as to an employee.[83]

d. Bridges, Trestles, and Culverts

A railroad company is liable to its servant for injuries resulting from its failure to exercise reasonable care and diligence to construct and maintain reasonably safe and sufficient bridges and culverts.

It is the duty of a railway company to exercise reasonable care and diligence to construct and maintain reasonably safe and sufficient bridges and culverts on its line, and it will be liable to its servant for injuries sustained by reason of its failure to do so.[84] This rule applies, even though the road was in course of construction and not open for trade

Assumption of risk

Although the failure of a railway company to fence its track as required by statute is evidence of negligence, this liability is subject to the qualification that, if an employee enters and continues in his employment, knowing that the road is not fenced, he assumes the risks naturally incident to such condition.—Kommerstad v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 139 N.W. 713, 120 Minn. 376—Fleming v. St. Paul & D. R. Co., 6 N.W. 448, 27 Minn. 111.

Custom not controlling

Propriety of using bents or other additional supports to prevent bridge from falling, after withdrawal of bolts from truss arm, cannot be governed by custom, since custom cannot be used to excuse an act of negligence.—Roberts v. Southern Ry. Co., 145 S.E. 255, 151 Va. 815.

Falling of bridge

or travel,[85] and though such structures had been erected by another company from whom the road was bought by the employer.[86] There can be no recovery, however, in the absence of negligence on the part of the company,[87] and thus, where the company has exercised such reasonable care as usual and ordinary conditions require, it will not be held liable for injuries sustained by reason of storms and floods which are of unusual and extraordinary violence, and which could not have been reasonably foreseen by competent and skillful persons.[88]

A railroad company is not bound, under the law, to erect any particular type or character of bridge,[89] and its failure to use the safer of two recognized methods of constructing a bridge is not in itself negligence.[90] Likewise, it is not as a matter of law required to maintain bannisters on trestles.[91]

§ 230. —— Obstructions or Erections on, over, or near Tracks

a. In general
b. Permanent structures and matters of engineering
c. Overhead bridges

a. In General

A railroad company is liable to its employee for injuries caused by its failure to exercise reasonable care and diligence to prevent dangerous obstructions on, over, or near its tracks.

A railroad company is bound to exercise reasonable care and diligence to prevent obstructions on, over, or near its tracks, which are a source of danger to its servants, and will be held liable for injuries occasioned by its neglect of such duty,[92] and constituted negligence.—Roberts v. Southern Ry. Co., 144 S.E. 863, 151 Va. 815, rehearing denied 145 S.E. 255, 151 Va. 815.

Walkway on bridge

(1) A railroad's duty to exercise reasonable care in furnishing a safe place to work did not pertain to any particular area on walkway on railroad bridge, which walkway was maintained by railroad for use of trainmen.—Thomson v. Boles, C.C.A. Minn., 123 F.2d 487, certiorari denied 62 S.Ct. 632, 315 U.S. 804, 86 L.Ed. 1204.

(2) Reasonable protection for those who might use walkway on railroad bridge was necessary, and failure to provide such reasonable protection would be actionable negligence.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Wilmouth, 153 S.E. 874, 154 Va. 582, certiorari denied Wilmouth v. Southern Ry. Corporation, 51 S.Ct. 81, 282 U.S. 878, 75 L.Ed. 775.

"Unbending test" of negligence, that use of methods pursued by others in similar work is evidence of exercise of reasonable care, held not conclusive in action for injuries to employee by fall of bridge after withdrawal of bolts from truss arm. —Roberts v. Following usage and custom

Fact that bridge was constructed and maintained in accordance with usage and custom of railroads tended to show an absence of negligence, but was not conclusive of exercise of due care by railroad.—Bly v. Southern Ry. Co., 31 S.E.2d 564, 183 Va. 162, opinion adhered to 32 S.E.2d 659, 183 Va. 406.

Lights; walkways

(1) In absence of evidence that such lights are, or could be, used, that due care requires their use, or that such lights as could have been made available would have avoided the accident, fact that there were no lights at bridge did not render railroad liable for death of freight brakeman when, during night switching operation, he stepped off side ladder of boxcar which had been stopped on unrailed bridge.—Kenney v. Boston & M. R. R., 33 A.2d 557, 92 N.H. 495.

(2) The court cannot declare as a matter of law that the absence of walkways from a particular bridge does not render it unsafe for employees.—Bly v. Southern Ry. Co., 31 S.E.2d 564, 183 Va. 162, opinion adhered to 32 S.E.2d 659, 183 Va. 406.

the employee has a right to assume that the employer has done its duty in this respect,[93] and it has been held that he is not required to make any investigation or inspection to find out whether the employer has been guilty of negligence.[94] On the other hand, the company will not be liable for injuries sustained by an employee where it was neither necessary nor customary for him to be in a position where he would be in danger of coming in contact with such an obstruction.[95]

Other cars or vehicles. The rule requiring a railway company to exercise reasonable care and diligence to prevent obstructions on or near its tracks which are a source of danger to its servants applies also to the presence of cars or vehicles of the company on adjacent tracks, switches, or sidings, as where they are dangerously close to other cars.[96]

b. Permanent Structures and Matters of Engineering

While a railroad company, where it can reasonably do so, must place structures at such a reasonably safe distance from the track as not to endanger employees, the maintenance of necessary structures so close to the tracks as to require caution on their part, or the narrowing of clearance space between tracks as a matter of necessary engineering, will not raise a presumption of negligence on the company's part.

It has generally been held that the maintenance of structures necessary for the proper conducting of the business of a railroad company so close to the track as to require caution on the part of employees against injury,[97] or the mere narrowing of the clearance space between tracks when compelled or advised as a matter of engineering,[98] will not raise a presumption of negligence on the part of the company, although it may be liable when a change in its rolling stock or equipment has increased the danger to the employee;[99] and, if a yard or house was reasonably safe when constructed, continuing to use it without rearranging the tracks, walls, or roof is not negligence,[1] unless it appears that such yards or houses are no longer in common use, or that changed conditions require greater clearance.[2] Where, however, a railroad company can reasonably do so, it is bound to place structures used in its business at such a reasonably safe distance from the track as not to endanger employees while discharging their duties.[3]

c. Overhead Bridges

A railroad company maintaining a dangerously low bridge over its track is liable to an employee who, not knowing the dangerous character of the bridge, is struck by it while performing his duties. A railroad company is liable to an employee injured as a result of its failure to comply with a statute requiring it to maintain telltales or other guards to warn of low bridges; in the absence of such statute authorities differ as to whether failure to maintain such guards constitutes negligence.

If a railroad company knowingly maintains or permits a bridge over its track so low that an employee cannot perform his duty on the top of the cars with reasonable safety, it is liable to such an employee, who, having no knowledge of the dangerous character of the bridge, is struck by it and injured while in the performance of his duties,[4] and this is true, even though the bridge was established by public authority before the company owned the road.[5]

Where a statute regulating the clearance of overhead bridges carried across railroad tracks relates only to bridges constructed after its enactment, minor repairs will not constitute such a subsequent rebuilding as to bring the bridge within the purview of the statute.[6]

Whipping straps, telltales, and other mechanical warnings. The failure of a railway company to maintain whipping straps, telltales, or bridge guards to warn employees who are on top of a train that it is about to pass under a bridge or viaduct so low as to imperil their lives has been held to constitute negligence on the part of the company;[7] but it has also been held that such failure is not legal negligence unless such devices are so manifestly serviceable that intelligent railroad men do not honestly differ in judgment as to their utility,[8] and that negligence cannot be predicated, in any event, on the company's failure to provide such telltales when it appears that they would have been of no service under the circumstances of the particular case.[9] Likewise, it is not negligence on the part of a company to fail to illuminate a low bridge on its tracks, in the absence of proof that such illumination is customary.[10]

The negligence of a railroad company in maintaining a low overhead bridge may be overcome by the use of proper safeguards and by proper warnings to its employees;[11] a device used for this purpose must be adequate to warn all the employees who, in the normal performance of their duties, will run the risk of being injured.[12]

Where railroad companies are required by statute to maintain telltales or other suitable guards as warnings against the danger from low bridges crossing their right of way, a railroad will be liable for injuries to its employees resulting from its failure to provide such guards as required by statute,[13] or from its negligence in improperly constructing or locating them,[14] or in permitting them

to become out of order or defective, so that they fail to perform the office intended,[15] and the rule applies to a railroad using the tracks of another railroad for the operation of its trains thereon.[16] Furthermore, the company will be liable for its negligence in improperly constructing or maintaining such guards, although the injuries did not result from their failure to function against the danger contemplated by the statute.[17] It has also been held that the erection of the signals required by statute does not render the railroad immune from the liability resulting from its negligence in having a dangerously low bridge or tunnel.[18]

A company's duty under the statute is discharged on proper warning,[19] unless there are defects of construction exaggerating the peril.[20]

3. Covering or Guarding Dangerous Machinery or Places

§ 231. In General

The failure of a master to provide guards, coverings, barriers, or railings for the machinery, appliances, or place of work does not of itself constitute negligence, but it is his duty to do so where the nature of the work and the circumstances are such as reasonably to require such precaution.

Although the failure on the part of the master to furnish protection for his servants against dangerous conditions by providing guards, coverings, barriers, or railings for the machinery or appliances, or place of work, will not of itself constitute negligence,[21] under the general rule that the master must exercise reasonable care to provide his servants with a reasonably safe place to work and with reasonably safe machinery and appliances, it is his duty to cover or otherwise guard dangerous machinery or places where the nature of the work and the circumstances are such as reasonably will require such precaution.[22]

§ 232. Machinery

a. In general
b. Statutory regulations

a. In General

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, the failure of a master to cover or otherwise guard his machinery is not negligence per se, but the question of negligence depends on the circumstances of each case.

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, it is not negligence per se for a master to leave his machinery uncovered or otherwise unguarded,[23] but the question depends on the circumstances of each case, the nature of the service, the degree of exposure, and notice thereof to the servant.[24] Where there are special circumstances enhancing the danger, the general rule that the master is under no duty to protect with guards moving parts of machinery is not applicable.[25] An express statutory exemption of agricultural pursuits from the application of a statute requiring guards or other protection for dangerous machinery does not relieve persons engaged in such pursuits of their common-law obligation to furnish employees with reasonably safe machinery with which to work.[26]

Negligence held not shown
Ark.—Sinclair Refining Co. v. Duff,

b. Statutory Regulations

(1) In general
(2) Construction in general
(3) Nature of employer's business
(4) Persons entitled to protection
(5) Particular machines and machinery
(6) Sufficiency of guards

(1) In General

Statutes requiring employers to cover, guard, or otherwise protect dangerous machinery are mandatory and impose liability on an employer for injuries to an employee caused by a failure to comply therewith.

Statutes requiring employers to cover, guard, or otherwise protect dangerous machinery are mandatory.[27] An employer's failure to comply with such a statute is negligence per se;[28] and, where an employee is injured thereby, the employer will be liable,[29] even though he was not negligent with respect to the construction, care, and maintenance of the machine itself.[30] Common practice and usage is not conclusive on the question of the employer's duty to guard a machine and will not excuse his failure to comply with a statutory requirement therefor.[31]

In order that an employee may recover for injuries alleged to have resulted from the master's noncompliance with the statute, it must be shown that the injury complained of resulted from a danger against which the statute was intended to provide,[32] that the person sued is the person on whom the duty to provide guards for the machinery is imposed,[33] and that the noncompliance with the

Another's machinery
A farm owner, sending farm hand to work on another's neighboring farm, was not liable for injuries, sustained by farm hand in machine on other farm, on ground of violation of statute requiring person using such a machine to provide safety devices, as neighboring farmer, not farm hand's employer, was using and operating machine at time of accident.—Redman v. Hobart, 22 N.W.2d 532, 248 Wis. 508.

Lessor
Under some statutes liability for injury from failure to guard machinery is limited to the employer in charge of the plant or establishment and does not extend to the owner of leased premises.—Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Booten, C.C.A. Neb., 57 F.2d 786.

Owner or person in charge
(1) Under statute imposing duty to guard machinery on owner or person in charge, owner only is liable for failure properly to guard machinery, unless person in charge is lessee or independent contractor. —Hane v. Mid-Continent Petroleum Corporation, D.C.Okl., 47 F.2d 244.

(2) Such a statute applies to a person having charge of the machinery for the purpose of changing the building, tearing it down, or otherwise handling, removing, or con-statute was the proximate cause of the injury, as considered infra § 254.

Effect of statutory duty of factory inspector to direct or give notice. Notwithstanding the powers and duties of a factory inspector under such a statute, the duty of the employer is absolute, and in an action by an employee to recover for injuries resulting from the noncompliance with the statute, it has generally been held that the failure of the master properly to protect his machinery will not be excused by the failure of the factory inspector to direct the use of guards,[34] or to give notice of the necessity of guarding.[35] Also, it has been held that a statute requiring an owner of a factory to supply, in the discretion of the factory inspector, shifters for throwing belts on or off the pulleys, and declaring that all gearing or belting shall be provided with proper safeguards, requires an owner of a factory to safeguard the gearing or belting without reference to the discretion of the factory inspector,[36] although under some statutes the liability depends on the fact of the factory inspector ordering the master to guard machinery and giving notice thereof.[37] The approval of machinery by a factory inspector will not of itself excuse a failure to comply with the statute.[38]

The testimony of a factory inspector as to what he did with respect to particular machinery may be important evidence on the question whether such machinery was so located or used that there was reasonable possibility of injury to employees therefrom, or whether it was practicable to house or guard it.[39] Also, evidence that the machinery had been examined and found without fault by such an inspector may be considered.[40]

Waiver. It has been held that an employee may waive the duty imposed on a master by statute to guard machinery;[41] but there is other authority to the contrary.[42]

(2) Construction in General

Statutes requiring employers to cover, guard, or otherwise protect dangerous machinery are remedial in character and should be reasonably and liberally construed so as to carry into effect the legislative intent, although not so as to extend them beyond the limits intended.

Statutes requiring employers to cover or guard dangerous machinery are to be given a reasonable construction.[43] They are remedial in character,[44] and should not receive a narrow construction.[45] They should be liberally[46] or favorably[47] construed to carry into effect the legislative intent. Such statutes, however, are not to be extended by construction beyond the limit of their plain intendment[48] or express terms,[49] or so as to impose liability on strangers to the enterprise;[50] and the courts are not warranted in adding features not structing it.—Hane v. Mid-Continent Petroleum Corporation, D.C.Okl., 43 F.2d 406.

(3) The phrase "or person in charge of a factory or institution" refers to a lessee or contractor who employs the laborers engaged in operating the business.—Hane v. Mid-Continent Petroleum Corporation, supra.

specified.[51] Such a statute does not as a rule impose on the master the duty of guarding against every possible danger.[52] When a right of action for injuries to an employee by reason of a violation of the statute is given in terms by the statute, such an action is not an action for a penalty or forfeiture but is an action for injuries to the rights of another not arising on contract.[53]

Absence of guard during repairs. The absence of a guard from a machine while being repaired, or while being tested for the purpose of seeing whether it has been properly repaired, has been held not to constitute negligence,[54] although other authority has held that the removal of a guard for the purpose of repair constitutes a violation of a statutory requirement for such a guard when the dangerous machinery is permitted to remain in use while thus exposed.[55]

(3) Nature of Employer's Business

Statutes requiring employers to cover, guard, or otherwise protect dangerous machinery do not apply to all businesses and occupations where machinery is in use, but generally are limited to industrial plants or enterprises.

Statutes requiring employers to cover, guard, or otherwise protect dangerous machinery do not apply to all businesses and occupations where machinery is in use;[56] and, in order to recover under the statute, an employee must show that his employer's business and the source of injury is within the scope of the statute.[57] In general such statutes have been construed as intended to apply to industrial plants or enterprises wherein machines are used and in or about which laborers are employed.[58] They have been applied to varying manufacturing[59] and industrial[60] enterprises, and to mercantile establishments.[61] Some statutes have been held to apply only to machinery used in factories, mills, or workshops.[62] On the other hand, such statutes have been held not applicable to hospital kitchens,[63] butcher shops,[64] or a sand pit operated by a county in connection with road and bridge work.[65] Such statutes have also been held not to apply to farm and agricultural pursuits,[66] except where the statute makes specific reference to farming pursuits wherein machines involving the use of mechanical power are used,[67] or where the statute expressly imposes on any person, firm, or

Degree of care required
Under the safe-place statute, devices used for carrying on agricultural pursuits and involving use of mechanical power must be so constructed and so guarded as to make the employment and place of employment as safe as its nature will reasonably permit.—Tiemann v. May, supra.

Prior statute
An earlier statute requiring the guarding of machinery and applying to "factories, workshops and other places of employment" was held not intended to extend to all places where persons are employed to perform labor and not intended to incorporation using specified farm machinery the duty of providing safety appliances therefor.[68]

Statutes requiring the guarding of machines and machinery in manufacturing establishments, factories, work shops, etc., have been held not limited in their application to buildings in which machinery is installed and used,[69] or to a permanent place where the enterprise is conducted.[70] They apply to any place where machinery is used for manufacturing purposes,[71] including an open yard,[72] or temporary locations,[73] such as highways and streets where portable appliances and machinery are used in paving operations.[74]

Manufacturing incidental to other business. The fact that a manufacturing establishment conducted by a railway company is a mere incident to its business as a common carrier, and that manufacturing is not within its charter powers, does not relieve a railway company from complying with a statute affecting factories.[75]

(4) Persons Entitled to Protection

In order to authorize recovery under statutes requiring employers to safeguard machinery, the person injured must be an employee within the class protected by the statute, and his activity at the time of injury must have been within the scope of the protection of the statute.

In order to authorize recovery under statutes requiring employers to safeguard machinery the person injured must be an employee[76] within the class protected by the statute,[77] and it must appear that at the time of the injury he was acting within the scope of his employment.[78]

Such statutes are intended to protect employees who are not required to be within the danger zone, but who may become engrossed in their work, or from lapse of memory or inattention place themselves in a position to be injured.[79] They ordinarily are held not only to protect workmen while doing those things naturally connected with, or incidental to, their regular tasks,[80] but also those engaged in exceptional or occasional duties.[81]

Statutes of the character under consideration have also been construed as not limited in their application to employees who work with and about the machinery when it is operated for the production of the product;[82] they apply to all employees who may be reasonably expected to come in contact with such machinery in the course of their employment,[83] and include those whose duties cover the testing of machines after they have been installed.[84] Furthermore, the protection extends to all places which employees might reasonably be expected to use in the performance of their duties.[85] An employee is protected while passing to and from his ordinary post of duty,[86] and while resting under a rule permitting him to do so.[87]

The failure of a servant to give his employer notice of the condition of machinery at which he was working will not preclude him from recovering under the Factory Act for injuries suffered because of its unguarded condition, since the failure to give the notice provided for in the act is not a prerequisite to recovery, but is solely to enable a workman to procure an inspection by the commissioner of labor of a defective machine which the employer neglected or refused to remedy.[88]

(5) Particular Machines and Machinery

An employer has the duty, if possible to do so, to cover, guard, or otherwise protect machines and machinery expressly designated as those which must be guarded or within the scope of a general statutory provision.

The employer has the duty, if possible to do so, to cover, guard, or otherwise protect machines and machinery of a kind specifically designated by statute,[89] or by rule adopted by an administrative agency under authority of a statute,[90] as those which must be guarded, or which are within the scope of a statute requiring machines and machinery generally in various designated establishments to be guarded.[91] On the other hand there can be recovery by the employee only where the machine, because of whose unguarded condition injuries resulted, was of the kind specifically designated[92] or within the scope of a general phrase.[93]

Such statutes do not impose on the employer the duty of guarding every piece of machinery regardless of its location,[94] although enumerated in the statute.[95] The duty to guard exists, under a statute requiring dangerous machinery, or machinery so located or used that employees may receive injury thereby, to be guarded, where danger may reasonably be anticipated from the use of the machine or machinery without protection.[96] The fact that the injury occurred is a fact to be considered in determining whether a machine is dangerous to persons employed therein or thereabouts.[97]

Some statutes requiring employers to cover or guard dangerous machinery have been held to apply to the operation of the machinery for any purpose including its operation for testing purposes, after its installation, and before its operation in connection with the production of the output of the factory.[98] Various statutes have been held not to apply to farm machinery;[99] but they are not rendered inapplicable by the mere fact that the machine is similar in principle to machines ordinarily employed in residences or on farms.[1] Other statutes, however, have been held to apply to farm machinery involving the use of mechanical power.[2]

Machines dangerous from contact or from flying particles. Statutes of the character under consideration apply to machines where the danger is from contact with the machine.[3] However, they have been held not to be limited to such machines,[4] and to apply to machines and machinery which is so located as to be dangerous by reason of breakage and flying particles caused by its ordinary operation,[5] including machines in which the danger is that material fed into it may be thrown back so as to injure the employee.[6] Other authority, however, has held that only the machines and not the material fed into them must be guarded,[7] and that the employer is under no duty to guard or protect the employee from flying particles thrown from the machine.[8]

Guards difficult to provide. Ordinarily there is no requirement, in some cases under statutes expressly so providing,[9] to guard machines where it is impossible to do so,[10] or where guards are not practicable and would not permit a proper use of the machinery without interfering with its efficiency.[11] The statutory requirement, however, may carry with it, at times, the duty to change the machinery so as to make a guard possible and practicable.[12]

Application of ejusdem generis rule. Although the general rule is that general words must take their meanings from and be presumed to embrace only things or persons of the kind designated in the specific words, the rule will not be applied when the specific words embrace all objects of their class, so that general words must bear a meaning different from the specific words or be meaningless,[13] or where the specific words signify subjects greatly different from one another and the apparent purpose of the statute as evidenced by its title is to protect operators in factories in every particular consistent with reasonable operations, and in such a case the general term must receive its natural and wide meaning.[14] Where the word "machinery" precedes the enumerated parts of machines to be guarded and is one of the things enumerated, the statute applies to the dangerous completed machines as well as to the particular machine parts specified,[15] although the opposite rule would seem to prevail where the word "machinery" follows, instead of precedes, the enumerated parts.[16] However, it has been held that, even though a general phrase follows particular designations, the doctrine of ejusdem generis cannot be applied so that the words "and machinery of every description" shall be limited by a prior enumeration when such enumeration is not an enumeration of machines.[17]

(6) Sufficiency of Guards

Guards are sufficient, within statutes requiring employers to safeguard machinery, where they guard against accidents which may be reasonably expected or which should be anticipated, and where they do not interfere with the use of the machine.

In general a machine is properly guarded, within a statute requiring employers to safeguard machinery, when it is guarded against accidents which may be reasonably expected to occur, or which, in the exercise of ordinary care, the master should have anticipated.[18] The guard required is some device in the nature of a shield or defense between the employee and danger, placed so as to protect him from injury while in the performance of some service required of him; and it is not necessary to make such a change in the structure of the machine, or to attach such a device thereto, as will relieve the employee from the performance of the service required of him.[19] A machine designed and used for one purpose need not be furnished with a guard which will render it safe when used for other purposes.[20] A statute requiring a specific device to be attached to a certain type of machine as a protection against a specific danger does not render inapplicable thereto a general statute requiring employers to cover or guard dangerous machinery.[21] It has been held unnecessary for the employer to guard against the employee's negligence or the negligence of a fellow servant, unless it appears that the employer should have anticipated that they would be negligent.[22]

In the absence of statutory specification, the question what constitutes a sufficient guard is to be determined by the circumstances of each particular case.[23] If the guard used safely and securely guards the machine it has been held unnecessary that it be the latest, or most improved, or any particular style of guard.[24]

It has been held the duty of the employer to use approved guards in general use,[25] and, if a master furnishes such a guard as is in general use among employers of ordinary care under the same or similar circumstances, he has discharged his duty, unless such appliance is obviously dangerous.[26] However, it has been held that the custom or practice prevailing in the particular industry, although a factor to be considered, will not of itself determine the sufficiency of the safety appliances and guards used.[27] Also, under various statutes it has been held that the machinery must be so guarded as to make the employment and place of employment as safe as its nature will reasonably permit,[28] or protected to the fullest extent that the proper operation of the machine will permit;[29] or that the master is required to use the most efficient and best known guards for the purpose.[30]

As a general rule, the employer is not only required to furnish a proper guard but must also see that it is so adjusted and used as to be effective for the purpose intended,[31] and the duty is not discharged by providing a guard which may be installed and used or laid aside at the caprice of the servant.[32] However, it has been held that the master will not be liable merely because, when a sufficient guard has been provided, it fails to function.[33] A worn guard has been held insufficient.[34]

Interference with use of machine. The master is not required to provide a guard which will materially interfere with the practical use and efficiency of the machine.[35] In order for the guard furnished to be proper it must not so interfere with the use of the instrumentality sought to be guarded as to make it unsuitable for the work required to be done.[36] Where it is not practicable to guard dangerous machinery fully, a partial compliance will comply with the statute.[37]

Substitutes for statutory requirements. While an employer may, as a substitute for the statutory requirement, make regulations to guard against any approach to such machinery unless it has been previously stopped, if he adopts such an alternative, he must be scrupulously careful to make the substituted method efficient.[38]

§ 233. Elevators, Hoistways, and Shafts

It is the duty of an employer to exercise ordinary and reasonable care to guard his elevators, hoistways, and shafts, or to comply with statutory requirements for safeguarding them, so as to protect his employees against such dangers therefrom as may be reasonably apprehended.

It is the duty of a master to exercise ordinary and reasonable care to guard his elevators, hoistways, or shafts so as to protect his servants against such dangers therefrom as may be reasonably apprehended.[39]

Statutes which require the safeguarding of elevators, hoistways, and shafts have a humane purpose[40] and are not to be given a restricted narrow construction.[41] An employer who fails to comply with the provisions of such a statute is guilty of actionable negligence.[42] The employer, however, is not an insurer of the employee's safety,[43] and it has been held that a violation of such a statutory provision is not conclusive evidence and does not in itself give a cause of action.[44] Also a statute requiring elevator shafts to be protected by guard rails and the use of due diligence to keep them closed when not in actual use has been held to impose no greater duty with respect to keeping the guard in position when the elevator is not in use than exists at common law.[45]

In order to authorize recovery under such a statute it must appear that the employee is within the class protected by the statute;[46] that the injury complained of resulted from a violation of the statutory requirement,[47] and from a danger against which the statute was intended to provide;[48] that the employer was within the class on whom the statute imposed the duty;[49] and that the business conducted by him,[50] and the appliances or place, because of whose unguarded condition the injury arose,[51] were within the purview of the provisions of the statute.

Duty dependent on requirement by public officer. Under some statutes provisions for the installation of safety devices are not mandatory, and an employer is not bound to install such devices unless required to do so by the factory inspector.[52]

§ 234. Hatchways and Chutes

The master has the duty, sometimes imposed by statute, to guard hatchways, chutes, and floor openings so as to protect his employees from dangers which may be reasonably anticipated therefrom.

The master is bound to use ordinary care to protect his servants from dangers which may be reasonably anticipated from open and unguarded hatchways and chutes,[53] although it has been held that stevedores have no general duty to guard under deck hatchways when their employees are not working, especially on decks where no cargo operations are going on.[54]

Statutes requiring hatchways, chutes, and floor openings to be guarded are to be reasonably construed,[55] and the employer's violation of such a statute has been held to be negligence per se.[56] It has been held, however, that a statute imposing a duty to guard hatchways does not require hatchways to be fenced while in use, in addition to providing covering therefor while not in use.[57]

4. Inspection and Repair

§ 235. In General

a. General rule
b. Effect of statutory regulations

a. General Rule

An employer is liable to his employees for injuries resulting from a failure to use ordinary care to inspect from time to time his machinery, appliances, and place of work and to make repairs so as to maintain them in a reasonably safe condition.

It is not only the duty of a master to use ordinary care to furnish his servant with a reasonably safe place to work, and with reasonably safe machinery and appliances, but he must also, by inspection from time to time, and by the use of ordinary care and diligence, in making repairs, keep them in a safe condition.[58] Nevertheless, actionable negligence cannot be predicated on the mere failure of the master to inspect, where an inspection would have disclosed no defects or dangers other than those which are already fully known and appreciated by the servant or which are already known to the servant and all others,[59] or where the employee is as well situated as the employer to discover the danger of injury.[60] It has also been held that an employer is under no duty to alter the condition of his premises in order to make them safe for his employee, except in cases of hidden defects.[61] A master is not liable when an accident happens to his servant on the first occasion when an appliance is used, if the method of use is the same method as would be required in order to make a proper test.[62]

It has been held that, if suitable tools and materials furnished the employee become unsuitable from their use in the progress of the work, the employer has no duty of inspection;[63] and that it is not the master's duty to repair defects arising in the daily use of an appliance, for which proper and suitable materials are supplied, and which may easily be remedied by the workmen, and are not of a permanent character, or do not require the help of skilled mechanics.[64] The master is not under a duty to inspect for trivial defects,[65] and he will not be liable for failure to inspect with regard to a transitory risk.[66] Although an employer is bound to keep his machinery in a reasonably safe condition, he need not keep it in the best possible order.[67] An employer has been held not to be liable for injuries to an employee resulting from the employee's improper repair of an appliance used.[68]

Basis of duty

The basis of the duty of employer to inspect appliances used by employees is the tendency of appliances to deteriorate while in use.—McCarthy v. Eddings, 127 P.2d 883, 109 Colo. 526.

Cost of repair

A master is bound to remedy dangerous conditions whenever it can be done at a comparatively small cost.—Tampa Shipbuilding & Engineering Co. v. Thomas, 179 So. 705, 131 Fla. 650.

Danger of disease

The master is required to exercise due care to discover the danger of disease incident to, or caused by, the employment and to inform his employee of the danger.—Steiner v. Spencer, 145 S.W.2d 547, 24 Tenn. App. 389.

Duty to expect deterioration

Master is chargeable with knowledge that appliances deteriorate, and are likely to cause injury to servants if not repaired.—Colonna Shipyard v. Dunn, 145 S.E. 342, 151 Va. 740, certiorari denied 49 S.Ct. 253, 279 U.S. 840, 73 L.Ed. 986.

Electrical equipment

(1) Operator of streetcar line with electricity is bound to inspect frequently and constantly test apparatus to see that there is nothing to cause charge injuring employee.—Foster v. Kansas City, C. C. & S. J. Ry. Co., 26 S.W.2d 770, 325 Mo. 18.

(2) Other electrical equipment see 39 C.J. p 415 note 15 [j].

Employees along railroad right of way

It is railway company's duty to anticipate presence of employees along its right of way, and to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuries to such persons by inspecting its trains to discover and eliminate objects which project or may be thrown therefrom.—Whittle v. Thompson, 179 S.W.2d 22, 352 Mo. 637—Noce v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., 85 S.W.2d 637, 337 Mo. 689.

Failure to repair after notice

(1) Where employee operating tool informs employer of its defective condition, but employer does not repair it, the employer is negligent and the employee is entitled to recover for damages for personal injuries suffered.—Rivers v. Krasowski, 22 N.E.2d 114, 303 Mass. 409.

(2) Employee who notified employer of defective condition of tool is not obliged to show a promise by employer to repair defective condition or to prove a reliance on such a promise in order to recover for personal injuries suffered.—Rivers v. Krasowski, supra.

Want of knowledge

Employer's want of knowledge of defect in appliance does not relieve him from liability for injury from breach of duty to inspect.—Burgess v. North Carolina Electrical Power Co., 136 S.E. 711, 193 N.C. 223.

Inspection after blasting. An employer using explosives in the prosecution of his work is bound to make a careful inspection to see that unexploded charges are not left after a blast.[69] This duty on the part of the employer continues, even though a contract for the driving of a tunnel in a mine has been let to a third person,[70] although it has been held that, since the danger from missed shots is incident to the work of drilling a mine, it is not the duty of a master to make inspection for them after each explosion.[71] The nature of the inspection which the employer should make to ascertain whether they are unexploded charges depends on the circumstances of the case.[72] The failure of a mine operator to inspect the rooms, used by a miner in the course of his work, after shots have been fired to discover defects in the roof and misplaced props in such room, does not constitute negligence.[73]

Poles and wires carried thereon. A telephone, telegraph, or electric light company owes a duty to its employees to inspect its poles and lines to keep them in a safe condition for its employees,[74] unless such duty had been devolved on the employee either by his contract of employment with the master, or by the master's method of conducting its business to the servant's knowledge,[75] and this duty extends to such parts of the poles as are below the surface of the ground.[76] A contractor has been held not to have a duty to inspect poles used in the construction of a temporary lighting system where no system of inspection is in use and the poles are so small and of such character that any ordinary laborer is able to ascertain whether they are safe to use.[77]

Simple or common tools and appliances. An employer is under no obligation to his servants to inspect during their use those common tools and appliances with which every one is familiar,[78] to discover defects which result from ordinary use and are, or should be, as well-known to the servant as to the master,[79] provided, it has been held, the employer has exercised ordinary care to furnish tools which are reasonably safe.[80] A simple tool within the rule is one which has no complications in structure and is of such ordinary use that any normally intelligent person of mature age or of experience will have substantially as much knowledge as another and can use it in the ordinary and normal manner without incurring more than a bare possibility of injury.[81]

(3) Generally a stepladder is held a simple tool.

Mere simplicity of the tool or appliance, however, will not relieve the master of all duty to inspect in every situation.[82] The question whether he is relieved of that duty is dependent on the facts and circumstances of the particular case,[83] and not on the tool or appliance alone.[84] Nonliability in such cases rests on the assumption that the employee is in as good, if not better, position to observe the defect as the employer.[85] The comparative knowledge of the master and servant is the test of the master's liability for injury occasioned by the use of simple tools;[86] and, where the conditions are such that the employee does not have such an opportunity for inspection of the tool, the simple tool rule is not applicable.[87] The application of the rule depends, among other things, on the nature of the employment;[88] the locality where the work is to be performed;[89] the use to which the tool is to be put by the employee;[90] whether the tool is subjected to any other stress than the muscular effort of the person using it;[91] and on the employee's age and experience,[92] his intelligence and skill,[93] capacity to appreciate danger,[94] and familiarity with the work to be done.[95]

Employees as to whom duty exists. The duty of the employer to inspect exists as to those employees who are strangers to the premises, or whose information is not such as to give them an appreciation of risks equal to that of the master.[96] It does not exist as to employees whose knowledge equals or surpasses that of the employer,[97] particularly where they have been hired because of a superior knowledge in the line of work;[98] to employees whose job is to inspect and repair the machinery and appliances involved,[99] even though at the time of injury they are not engaged in inspecting or repairing the particular place or appliance which caused the injury;[1] to employees whose work is of such a nature that its progress constantly produces changes in the conditions and surroundings;[2] or where there is a constant shifting of position and the task is such that the employee has the same opportunity of examination, inspection, and the capacity to appraise the risk as the employer.[3]

b. Effect of Statutory Regulations

(1) In general
(2) Statutes applying to mines

(1) In General

Under statutes so providing employers are required to inspect, test, and maintain in a reasonably safe condition the employee's place of work and the machinery and appliances used, and they are liable for injuries to employees resulting from a violation of such duties.

Under various employer's liability acts the absolute and continuing duty is imposed on employers to inspect and test the employee's place of work and the machinery and appliances used so as to detect any defects therein and maintain a reasonably safe place of work.[4] A statute which predicates negligence on the failure to discover defects in the condition of the ways, machinery, etc., contemplates inspection, and the duty to inspect exists just as the duty to remedy defects exists.[5] A statute invalidating any contract or rule enabling the carrier to exempt itself from liability to employees forbids the shifting to employees of the duty of inspecting appliances.[6] Under some statutes which impose absolute duties on the employer, he is made liable for injuries resulting from his failure to comply with the statutory requirements irrespective of inspection.[7]

Since, as discussed supra §§ 226–228, the Federal Safety Appliance Acts, 45 U.S.C.A. § 1 et seq., including the Boiler Inspection Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 23, are absolute in their requirements, they are applicable where there is some mechanical defect in the engine, tender, car, or some appliance or tool appurtenant thereto, causing injury to the employee,[8] and without regard to whether the employer had made a proper inspection thereof,[9] provided, as considered in Commerce § 40, they are in use in interstate commerce.

(2) Statutes Applying to Mines

Under statutes so providing mine operators have the duty of inspecting the mine and its machinery and appliances, and they are liable for injuries to employees resulting from a failure to comply with that duty.

Under statutes so providing operators of mines have the duty of inspecting the mine and the machinery and mining appliances used therein,[10] and an employer who fails to comply with the statutory duty to inspect is liable for injuries to an employee resulting therefrom.[11] A statute, imposing on mine owners the duty to keep careful watch to see that as the miners advance their excavations all loose coal, slate, and rock overhead are carefully secured against falling, requires more than ordinary diligence to furnish a safe place to work, and was not intended merely to declare the common-law duty already imposed.[12] Any failure of the owner or operator of a mine to employ, pursuant to such a statute, a mine boss who shall make inspection will render him liable in damages for injury to a miner which would have been obviated by compliance with such statute.[13] A statute requiring an examiner to inspect a mine and mark dangerous places is mandatory,[14] and the operator cannot excuse himself on the ground that the mine examiner thought in good faith that the place was safe.[15] The master is not relieved from the duty imposed by the statute, although the miner is required by another provision of the same act to sound and thoroughly examine the roof of his working place.[16] The duty imposed by the statute extends to workmen engaged in making a dangerous place safe.[17] Such a statute, however, imposes liability only for a willful failure to comply with its terms,[18] and, where a proper examination is made and no dangerous condition has been discovered, the employer is not liable for a miner's injuries, although the premises were not marked as dangerous.[19] A statute requiring examination of a working place in a mine does not apply to a place where an employee is not required to work or where he is not reasonably required to go.[20]

Inspection against accumulation of gas. A statute requiring examination of coal mines generating fire damp applies to all mines generating such gas in appreciable quantities,[21] and a statutory provision as to the examination of mines known to generate explosive gases is applicable whether or not gases existed in sufficient quantity to make mines unsafe or dangerous.[22] However, various statutes requiring the inspection of gaseous mines or mines generating gas or fire damp have been construed as not applicable to mines not generating gas or where a gaseous condition was not found or known to exist previous to the employee's injury.[23] The duty imposed by a statute requiring inspection for protection against the accumulation of gas is personal and cannot be delegated.[24]

§ 236. Places of Work Belonging to, and Instrumentalities Belonging to or Provided by, Third Person

a. In general
b. Railroad cars

a. In General

An employer has the duty to inspect and keep in repair premises or instrumentalities of another which are used by his employees where he has control thereof, or the right to inspect and repair, or if he directs his employees to use them; but this duty does not extend to premises over which he has no control and to which the employee goes on a temporary service.

property[26] does not relieve the master from the duty of using reasonable care to inspect such premises when, during the progress of the work, they are under his control or he has authority to inspect them. If an employer adopts and uses the instrumentalities of a third person in the performance of his work, he is under the duty to use reasonable care to inspect them;[27] and the fact that he neither owns nor controls them does not relieve him, as to his employees, of that duty.[28] He is guilty of negligence if he permits the use of obviously defective gear furnished by a third person,[29] although he may to some extent rely on the duty of such third person to furnish appliances which are initially safe.[30] This duty to inspect includes equipment furnished by another with whom the employer is carrying on a joint operation,[31] and appliances or tools which are rented[32] or borrowed[33] from another.

The employer also has the duty to inspect and keep in repair premises and appliances he directs his employees to use.[34] If he has no right or is not in a position to make inspection and repair instrumentalities[35] or a place of work[36] furnished by a third person, he must refrain from directing their use, whereby the safety of employees is imperiled.

On the other hand, an employer has been held to have no duty to inspect and repair premises not under his control, which are used by his employees.[37] He is under no obligation to inspect premises to which a servant has been sent on a temporary service and which are fully under the control of another,[38] or premises over which the servant may or must travel before or after engaging in the employment for which he was hired.[39]

Stevedores. A contracting stevedore has the duty to inspect for obvious and patent defects the ship on which his employees work and the gear furnished by the shipowner, and he is guilty of negligence if he permits the use by his employees of obviously defective gear furnished by the shipowner.[40] However, he may to some extent rely on the duty of the shipowner to furnish initially safe appliances;[41] and, in the absence of any condition to excite suspicion or to suggest defects or dangers, the contracting stevedore may accept as safe the place furnished by the ship and assume the safety of appliances and that due care has been used by the shipowner to keep and maintain them in a reasonably safe condition.[42]

b. Railroad Cars

A railroad company has the same duty to inspect foreign rolling stock hauled over its roads as it has to inspect its own rolling stock, except that it need not make tests to discover hidden defects in construction or material.

The railroad owes the duty to its employees to use reasonable care in inspecting all rolling stock used, and this includes foreign cars hauled over its roads.[43] This duty is to make careful inspection of their obvious or apparent condition.[44] However, it is not required to make tests to discover hidden defects in construction or material.[45] Also it is under no duty to inspect cars or parts thereof with respect to employees whose work is that of inspecting and repairing such cars or parts,[46] or with respect to car repairers whose duty it is to repair such cars.[47] A consignee is not required to inspect, before they are loaded, cars supplied by a common carrier which his employees will unload, and, in the absence of obvious defects or knowledge thereof, he is not liable for injuries to his employees while unloading a defective car.[48]

§ 237. Purchases from Reputable Manufacturer

An employer has been held not to be required to inspect simple tools and appliances furnished his employees where they are purchased from a reputable manufacturer, although it has also been held that he is not thereby relieved from all duty to inspect.

It has been held that an employer who purchases simple or common tools from a reputable manufacturer need not make inspection thereof to ascertain their fitness for use.[49] This rule, however, has been held not to relieve the employer of all duty to inspect.[50] In such case it is the employer's duty to examine and discover patent defects,[51] but he is not guilty of negligence for a failure to test for and to discover latent defects.[52] An employer is not entitled to assume that a tool bought from a reputable manufacturer will remain fit after being in use for a long time.[53]

§ 238. Latent Defects

An employer owes the duty to his employees to make a reasonable inspection of his place of work, tools, and appliances to discover latent defects.

It has been held that as a part of his duty to furnish reasonably safe appliances and a reasonably safe place to work, an employer must make a reasonable inspection to discover latent or concealed defects or dangers,[54] and to remedy them;[55] and that whether or not a defect is open to observation,

Before acceptance
The railroad has the duty of inspection before accepting cars tendered by another, and it is negligent if it accepts a defective car.—Kurtz v. Detriot, T. & I. R. Co., 213 N.W. 169, 238 Mich. 289, certiorari denied 48 S.Ct. 31, 275 U.S. 535, 72 L.Ed. 412.

What constitutes latent defect
(1) Latent defects are those which are discoverable only by proper inspection.—Moody v. Hardeman, 162 S.E. 653, 44 Ga.App. 676—Rountree v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co., 120 S. E. 654, 31 Ga.App. 231—Cochrell v. Langley Mfg. Co., 63 S.E. 244, 5 Ga. App. 317.

(2) No defect in instrumentality furnished by master for servant's use can be considered latent which is discoverable by exercise of due care.—Stoutimore v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 92 S.W.2d 658, 338 Mo. 463—Forbis v. Hessing, 41 S.W.2d 378, 328 Mo. 699.

if there is a discoverable defect, the master is negligent if he does not make a proper inspection.[56] In so far as latent defects are concerned the employer has been held to a higher standard of care and to be bound to discover them sooner than his employees.[57]

Where there is nothing to indicate to an employer exercising ordinary care that latent defects exist, he is under no duty to discover them.[58] The failure of an employer to find and remove latent defects, which he is unable to discover by reasonable and proper care, tests, or inspection, ordinarily constitutes no negligence on his part,[59] at least where the appliance is not complicated or dangerous and is purchased from a reputable manufacturer.[60] If a proper inspection would not have disclosed the defect which caused the injury, the mere failure to inspect will not warrant holding the employer liable.[61] This rule, however, has no application where the defects are created or augmented by the negligence of the employer.[62] An employer who makes the tool or erects the building, either in person or by the hand of another, has been held to be responsible to his employees for injuries resulting from negligent fabrication.[63] The rule which relieves the employer of the duty to inspect simple tools, as considered supra § 235 a, has been held not to apply where the defect in the tool or appliance is caused by faulty construction or reconditioning, which is not apparent or discoverable by ordinary inspection, and which is not caused by ordinary use of the tool.[64]

§ 239. Manner and Extent of Inspection or Test

The inspection of his machinery, appliances, and places of work which an employer is required to make must be adequate and proper, and the question what is an adequate and proper inspection depends on the circumstances of the particular case.

The inspection of his machinery, appliances, and place of work which an employer is required to make, as discussed supra § 235, must be adequate[65] and proper.[66] The question what is an adequate and proper inspection or test depends on the circumstances of the particular case,[67] and must be such as a reasonably prudent man, in the exercise of reasonable care, would deem necessary under the same or similar circumstances.[68] The manner and extent of the inspection depend, among other things, on the character or nature of the place, appliance, or machine to be inspected,[69] the materials composing it,[70] the uses to which it is put,[71] the danger to which the employee is subjected,[72] the danger to be anticipated if inspections are not made,[73] the length of time the appliance has been in use,[74] and to some extent on the source from which the appliance was obtained[75] and the circumstances attending its procurement.[76]

An employer who has had notice of the probable existence of a defect should make more than a perfunctory examination;[77] but he is not required, unless put on notice as to the probable existence of defects, to employ unusual or extraordinary tests,[78] or to adopt the latest and most improved methods of testing machinery or appliances.[79] Infrequent inspections may be sufficient where the structure is permanent and does not deteriorate rapidly.[80]

A smaller degree of care in the inspection of machinery and appliances may be required where they were purchased from a reputable manufacturer.[81] Accordingly, a minute inspection for latent defects is not required to be made of a simple appliance purchased from a reputable manufacturer;[82] but, where the instrumentalities purchased are not of such character as to be termed simple or common tools, the employer is required to use reasonable care to inspect them.[83] An employer performs his duty where a machine, tool, or appliance purchased from a reputable manufacturer appears to be in good condition for the services required, and he is not required to take it apart or otherwise test it to discover whether there is any defect in its construction,[84] except where the instrumentality or appliance is to be put to an extraordinarily hazardous use.[85] An employer who leases equipment has been held to be entitled to rely on its being in proper condition to operate for the purposes for which it is leased, and is not required to disassemble it in order to discover whether a defective condition exists therein.[86]

In order to be adequate, a test of handholds or grabirons on railroad cars, it has been held, must be similar to that which they will receive in use,[87] but other authority has also held that it is unnecessary to use physical force to test their condition, unless some indication of weakness or a defect is perceived on careful inspection in the ordinary way by the eye.[88] An intervening carrier is only required to inspect cars originating on another line in an ordinarily prudent manner;[89] and it is not required to test the proper loading of a sealed car by breaking the seal and examining its contents where there is no indication of anything unusual and a normal check indicates that the car is properly loaded.[90]

§ 240. —— Customary Methods

The adoption of customary and generally approved methods of inspection or tests by an employer for the discovery of defects or dangers in his machinery, appliances, or place of work is ordinarily held sufficient; but a custom not to inspect will not relieve the employer of a duty to do so.

While not conclusive on the question of negligence,[91] the adoption by the master of the customary and approved means or tests for the discovery of defects in his machinery or appliances will, as a rule, discharge his duty to his servants in that regard, and an injury sustained by a servant notwithstanding must be accepted as resulting from one of the risks of the occupation.[92] However, a custom not to inspect will not relieve the employer of the duty to do so.[93]

§ 241. Time and Opportunity for Inspection and Repair

a. In general
b. Opportunity to remedy defects

a. In General

The duty of an employer to inspect his machinery, appliances, and place of work for dangers and defects therein is a continuing one, which must be performed at reasonably frequent intervals.

Although an employer is entitled to a reasonable opportunity for inspection,[94] the duty to inspect is a continuing one,[95] which must be performed at reasonably frequent intervals,[96] and whenever the circumstances are such as to suggest the propriety of an inspection.[97] A master is not required to exercise that exquisite and exhaustive care in the constant examination and overhauling of his machinery and work which would be incompatible with the proper furtherance of business,[98] and need not make an examination of a tool before each and every operation thereof.[99]

The fact that the master has purchased a completed and presumably tested structure from another does not relieve him of the obligation to take reasonable care to know or ascertain the safety of its design and construction, and he will be charged with knowledge of defects which a competent examination would have disclosed.[1]

b. Opportunity to Remedy Defects

An employer is entitled to a reasonable time after knowledge, actual or constructive, of defects or dangers in his place for work, machinery, or appliances in which to remedy them, unless he caused or was responsible for the defect or danger.

Actual or constructive knowledge by the employer of the defective condition of his places for work, machinery, or appliances does not make him liable for injuries resulting therefrom, unless he has had a reasonable opportunity after acquiring such knowledge to remedy the defects,[2] and the same rule applies under an employers' liability act.[3] Conversely, an employer has a duty to remedy or remove a defect or danger within a reasonable time after acquiring knowledge of it,[4] and he is liable for injuries caused by a failure to remedy defects of which he was notified or had knowledge or could have discovered in the exercise of ordinary care.[5]

The right to a reasonable time within which to make reasonable repairs is not involved where the defect is in a machine or appliance constructed by the employer himself,[6] where the employer is charged with a specific act of negligence in placing an obstruction in a position likely to cause injury,[7] or where the defect would have been earlier discovered if a custom established by the employer had been adhered to.[8] Also the rule does not apply where an employer with knowledge of the defective condition of an appliance or apparatus nevertheless orders an employee to continue work thereon.[9]

§ 242. Inspection by Public Authorities

An official inspection and test of the employer's place of work, machinery, or appliances by a public official, pursuant to a statute therefor, do not relieve the employer from the duty of making further tests or from liability for negligence in respect thereto.

An official inspection and test of the employer's place of work, machinery, or appliances by a public official or officials, pursuant to a statute providing therefor, do not necessarily relieve the employer from the duty, with respect an employee, of making further tests.[10] The fact that appliances or machinery have not been condemned,[11] or that notice of defects therein has not been given to the employer, by a statutory inspector,[12] is not conclusive on the question whether such machinery or appliances are safe and does not relieve the master from the duty of safeguarding such apparatus as required by statute, and the fact that a factory inspector has approved machinery or appliances does not relieve the employer from liability for negligence in respect thereof.[13]

A contractor who arranges with the owner of a ferryboat to transport his workmen to and from their place of work has been held entitled to rely on a certificate of the boat's seaworthiness provided by United States authorities charged with the duty of inspection and responsible for the release of the vessel for service, unless notice of its unseaworthiness is brought home to the contractor.[14]

§ 243. Operation and Effect

An employer may be relieved from liability for injuries to an employee resulting from defects not disclosed by a proper test and inspection.

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, where machinery or appliances have been carefully tested and found to be in good condition, the master may not be liable for injuries resulting from defects which were not disclosed by such a test.[15] However, in order to excuse him from liability it must appear not only that the inspector was competent, but also that the inspection was a reasonably careful one,[16] and a master, by having appliances inspected to determine whether they are safe and fit for a certain use, does not relieve himself from responsibility to a servant who, acting under orders, devotes them to a use totally different from that with respect to which such inspection was made.[17]

If, in doing the work of keeping the working place safe, the employer creates a more dangerous condition than ordinarily exists, it may not be held, as a matter of law, that the employer is not negligent.[18]

5. Knowledge by Master of Defect or Danger

§ 244. In General

The master's liability for injuries to a servant arising from defects in the place for work, or in the machinery or appliances, is dependent on his knowledge, actual or constructive, of such defects.

The master's liability for injuries to a servant arising from defects in the place for work, or in the machinery or appliances, is dependent on his knowledge, actual or constructive, of such defects. If he knew or should have known, by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, of their existence, he is liable, since negligent ignorance is equivalent to knowledge,[19] and an employer chargeable with knowledge has the duty to warn his servant of dangers and to provide reasonable means of avoiding them.[20] On the other hand, actual or constructive knowledge of the danger or defect is essential in order to establish the employer's liability for negligence;[21] the dangerous condition must be shown to have existed for a sufficient time to permit its discovery and correction by the use of ordinary care,[22] and if the employer had no knowledge of the de-

Anticipating result

Where employer was charged with the knowledge of defective condition of locomotive, and was charged with knowledge, that any prudent men would have possessed, that the use of such engine would probably result in injury to those using it, the employer was chargeable with knowledge that some injury might result even though it could not foresee the precise injury that did occur, and under the circumstances there could be no issue as to defendant's anticipating results of its use.—Galveston, H. & S. Under statute. The fact that a liability is imposed on the master by statute for negligence of his agents or employees does not affect the rule that he is not liable for injuries to his servant caused by defects in machinery, appliances, or place of work of which he has neither actual nor constructive knowledge.[25] However, constructive knowledge will suffice,[26] and if the master has failed to comply with the mandatory requirements of a statute with respect to machinery or appliances, or place for work, the master will be liable for injuries resulting therefrom regardless of his knowledge.[27] Under some statutes the master is deemed to have knowledge of defects and this presumption stands as prima facie evidence of knowledge,[28] and in some cases the statute imposes the duty on the master of knowing the condition of his premises in respect of dangerous elements.[29]

§ 245. Structural Defects

Where the defect in an appliance or building is shown to be structural and is of such a character as to render it unsafe, it may be inferred that the employer was aware of the defect, and an employee who has been injured by such an appliance need not show that the master knew that it was defective.

who has been injured by such an appliance need not show that the master knew that it was defective.[30] This is particularly true where it is shown that the master himself constructed the defective appliance or structure.[31] If, however, a particular structure, machine, or appliance is without fault as to plan, mode of construction, and character of material, so that it was originally sufficient for all the purposes for which it was designed, and if the master has it afterward properly inspected by competent and skillful men, who exercise ordinary diligence to keep it in repair, the master has discharged his duty, and is not liable to a servant for an injury received by reason of a defect therein, unless it is shown that he had knowledge of such defect, and failed to remedy it.[32]

§ 246. Hidden or Improbable Dangers

A master is not liable for the result of hidden or improbable dangers, of which he did not have, and by the exercise of reasonable care could not obtain, knowledge.

While there is a presumption that a master having knowledge of defects in the place for work, or in the machinery or appliances, has knowledge of the consequences which may result therefrom,[33] and will be held liable for injuries to a servant resulting from known or probable dangers,[34] he is not liable for the result of hidden or improbable dangers, of which he did not have, and by the exercise of reasonable care could not obtain, knowledge.[35] Facts which do not necessarily operate to charge a servant with notice of the danger arising from the defective condition of machinery may operate to charge the master with such notice, since the obligation on each arising from the mere knowledge of the defective condition is not alike.[36]

§ 247. Latent Defects

An employer is not responsible for injuries to his servant resulting from latent dangers or defects unless he knew or should have known thereof.

A master is not liable for injuries resulting to a servant by reason of latent defects of which he was ignorant and which could not be discovered in the exercise of reasonable care and diligence.[37] An employer, however, has been presumed to be familiar with both latent and patent dangers ordinarily accompanying the business in which he is engaged,[38] and he has been held to be liable where he knew or should have known of the danger or defect despite its latent character.[39]

§ 248. Constructive Notice

a. In general
b. Time and opportunity for discovery
c. Notice to servants or agents

a. In General

Generally speaking an employer is chargeable with notice or constructive knowledge of any danger or defect which he should have discovered by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence.

In order to render a master liable for an injury to a servant caused by a defect in the place of work or in the machinery or appliances, it is not necessary that the master should have had actual knowledge of the defect; it is sufficient to show that he could have discovered it by the exercise of reasonable, proper, and ordinary care and diligence in performing the duties of master.[40] Thus an employer, ir-

b. Time and Opportunity for Discovery

The presence of sufficient time and opportunity for discovery of a danger or defect ordinarily charges an employer with constructive knowledge of its existence.

A master will be charged with constructive knowledge of a defect which has existed such a length of time that it must have been discovered in the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care and diligence on his part,[47] but where the time during which a danger or defect exists is too short to charge the employer with notice none will be imputed to him.[48] How long a defect must have existed in order to charge the master with notice is generally a question of fact, depending on the facts and circumstances of the particular case.[49] Where there is nothing to show the length of time during which a danger or defect existed, ordinarily the employer may not be charged with constructive knowledge of its existence.[50]

c. Notice to Servants or Agents

Notice to a servant or agent who stands in the position of a vice principal and who is charged with those duties of the master, the neglect of which occasions the injury of which complaint is made, is notice to the master.

A master is not charged with constructive notice by reason of a notice to a fellow servant,[51] or to a servant or agent who has no control or supervision over the place of work, machinery, or appliances, the defective condition of which is the cause of the injury complained of,[52] but notice to a servant or agent who stands in the position of a vice principal, and who is charged with those duties of the master, the neglect of which occasioned the injury, is notice to the master,[53] and if such representative, instead of performing his duties himself, enjoins their performance on another servant in his employ, he is chargeable with whatever notice such servant has or ought to have while performing such duties.[54] It is immaterial whether notice, had by one acting in the capacity of a vice principal, was given by the injured employee or some one else.[55] Notice to an employer's prior vice principal of defects is notice to the employer, although the vice principal did not occupy such position at the time of the accident.[56] It has also been held that if, during the existence of the relation of principal and agent, the agent receives notice in his private capacity of facts not then concerning his principal, but afterward acts for the principal in a matter in which such facts are material, the notice so received by the agent should be imputed to the principal.[57]

Mines. The rule that notice to a servant or agent who stands in the position of a vice principal and who is charged with those duties of the master, the neglect of which occasioned the injury, is notice to the master, applies to the owners and operators of mines.[58] In some jurisdictions a mine examiner[59] or a mine boss[60] whom the operator is required to employ by statute and on whom the statute imposes certain duties is the vice principal of the operator, and notice to him is notice to the operator. In other jurisdictions it has been held that a mine boss[61] or a fire boss[62] appointed pursuant to statute who does not perform any duties except those imposed on him by statute does not represent the master and that notice to him of defects will not bind the master.

6. DANGEROUS OPERATIONS AND IMPROPER OR UNUSUAL USE OR TEST

§ 249. Dangerous Operations

A master is not bound to provide a safe place where the work on which the servant is engaged is such as to render the place where it is done temporarily insecure.

A master is not bound to provide a safe place where the work on which the servant is engaged is such as to render the place where it is done temporarily insecure.[63]

§ 250. —— Making Dangerous Place Safe; Repairs

The rule requiring an employer to furnish his employees with a safe place to work is inapplicable to employees hired to make a dangerous place safe or to effect repairs.

The rule as to the duty of the master with regard to the place of work, machinery, and appliances does not apply to cases in which the work on which the servant is engaged consists of making repairs[64] or to cases in which the employee is engaged in the work of making a dangerous place safe.[65] However, this exception to the general rule that a master must furnish his servant with a safe place to work cannot be relied on by the master when the servant has been injured by reason of a danger not attendant on such work, and in respect of which a duty rested on the master;[66] nor does the exception apply when the employee is engaged at the time of the injury on such work on the order, or under the direction, of the master or his vice principal.[67] Even where an employee is engaged in repair work, a duty rests on the employer to make the place as safe as may reasonably be done in view of the conditions.[68]

§ 251. Improper or Unusual Use or Test

Where the place of work, machinery, or appliance is reasonably safe and suitable for the purpose for which it was intended, a servant cannot hold his master liable for personal injuries resulting from its inappropriate, unauthorized, unnecessary, careless, improper, or unusual use or test.

Where the place of work, machinery, or appliance is reasonably safe and suitable for the purpose for which it was intended, a servant cannot hold his master liable for personal injuries resulting from its inappropriate, unauthorized, unnecessary, careless, improper, or unusual use or test.[69] The law does not exact of the master the extraordinary diligence which would be requisite if it were required that instrumentalities intended for one use should be safe and suitable for every unintended use to which they might casually or unexpectedly be applied,[70] and an employer is not chargeable with negligence because he omits to inspect an instrumentality to determine its suitability for such unexpected and unintended uses.[71] The employer is under no duty to guard against improper or unusual methods of use by an employee unless the improper use has, to the knowledge of the employer, become habitual among employees,[72] and the employer's acquiescence in such a secondary use must be shown before he may be held negligent in not furnishing a safe instrumentality for such secondary purpose.[73] When, however, an appliance is improperly used with the knowledge of the master, it makes no difference, as far as his liability for such improper use is concerned, whether or not it was originally built for such purpose;[74] and where a master subjects an appliance to an unusual and uncontemplated service or strain, by reason of which a servant is injured, he may be held liable.[75]

7. Proximate Cause of Injury

§ 252. In General

In order to hold a master liable for injury to a servant alleged to have been caused by defects in the place for work, or in the machinery or appliances, the alleged defects must be shown to have been the proximate cause of the injury.

Okl.—Janow v. Lewis, 172 P.2d 315, 197 Okl. 415.

Act of third person in knocking ironing board off hook on door was an intervening efficient cause as re-

cause of injury must be the efficient cause which set in motion the chain of circumstances leading to the injury;[85] if the negligence complained of merely furnished a condition by which the injury was possible and a subsequent independent act caused the injury, the existence of such condition is not the proximate cause of the injury.[86] It is not necessary that the proximate cause have been immediate in time, and the fact that the injury occurred some time after the negligent act may be immaterial,[87] and in seeking the proximate cause of an employee's injury one must look to conditions as they actually were at the time of injury and not as they might have been.[88]

Sole or several causation. The master's negligence need not have been the sole cause of his employee's injury in order to impose liability,[89] and the master may be held responsible where his negligence was a concurring proximate cause of the injury.[90] If the injury would not have occurred but for the unsafe place or appliance which intervened proximately to cause the injury, it constituted one of the proximate concurring causes of the injury no matter what set in motion the train of events culminating in such injury.[91] On the other hand, an employer is not liable for injury to his employee in an accident resulting from any of several causes, where it appears that the employer was responsible for some but not for others.[92]

§ 253. Buildings

A defect in a building for which the employer is responsible must be the proximate cause of his employee's injury or there can be no recovery against him.

Where plaintiff alleges a breach of the employer's duty to furnish him a safe building as a place for work, he can recover only where defects in or about such building are shown to be the proximate cause of the injury.[93] This is true where the defects consist of the master's failure to comply with a statutory requirement in respect of such place of work.[94]

§ 254. Defective or Dangerous Machinery

In order to hold a master liable for injuries to a servant alleged to have been caused by reason of defective machinery or appliances, such defective condition must be shown to have been the proximate cause of the injury.

defective machinery or appliances, such defective condition must be shown to have been the proximate cause of the injury;[95] and, although negligence is alleged in respect of the master's failure to comply with a statute requiring the guarding of machinery for the safety of employees, there can be no recovery for injuries alleged to have been received by reason of noncompliance with such a statute unless a causal connection is shown between such negligence and the injuries complained of.[96] However, an employer may be held liable for injuries sustained by his employee where the injury was proximately caused by dangerous or defective machinery,[97] even though the precise manner of injury could not have been foreseen,[98] and the fact that the master's negligence was combined with another independent intervening cause does not preclude recovery.[99] Moreover, the fact that an employee was injured as a result of his normal reaction to the stimulus of a situation created by defective or dangerous machinery rather than directly by such machinery does not destroy the chain of causation.[1]

§ 255. Railroads

In order to hold a railroad liable for injuries to a servant alleged to have been caused by defects in its structures or equipment, the alleged defects must be shown to have been the proximate cause of the injury.

The general rule, discussed supra § 252, that in order to hold a master liable for injuries to a servant alleged to have been caused by defects in the place of work, or in the machinery or appliances, the alleged defects must be shown to have been the proximate cause of the injury applies to actions against railroads.[2] The injury sustained must be one reasonably to have been foreseen as a natural consequence of the railroad's default in such respect in order to render it liable,[3] and the railroad will not be responsible where an independent intervening agency was the cause of injury.[4] Where, however, the danger or defect for which the railroad is responsible constituted the proximate cause of the injury, liability is imposed,[5] and an employee may recover for injuries proximately caused by the rail-

§ 256. —— Tracks and Roadbeds

In an action against a railroad company for injuries alleged to have been caused by a defective condition of the tracks or roadbed, in order for plaintiff to recover it must be shown that the violation of the employer's duty in that respect was the proximate cause of the injury.

In an action against a railroad company for injuries alleged to have been caused by a defective condition of the tracks or roadbed, in order for plaintiff to recover it must be shown that the violation of the employer's duty in that respect was the proximate cause of the injury,[7] and this is true where the negligence is predicated on a violation of a statute or a municipal ordinance.[8] It is not essential to liability of the railroad that it should have been able to anticipate the precise character of the accident or injury to an employee resulting from defective tracks or roadbed.[9] The company will not be relieved from liability because other causes contributed to the accident,[10] but it will not be liable where the injuries were caused by the intervening wrongful act of a third person.[11]

Condition rather than cause
Railroad signal maintainer, jumping from railroad track car, stalled at highway crossing by cinders in flangeways of rails, because of imminent collision with motorist who attempted to pass to rear of track car instead of stopping, could not recover from employer for injuries sustained, since presence of cinders in flangeways was a condition rather than cause of accident.—Morse v. Pennsylvania R. Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 74 F.2d 677, certiorari denied 55 S.Ct. 655, 295 U.S. 743, 79 L.Ed. 1689.

Unbroken chain of causation
The mere fact that with a sound rail opposite the derailer which caused derailing of a car and death of brakeman the accident might not have happened was insufficient to impose liability on railroad under Federal Employers' Liability Act since railroad's negligence must be a link in unbroken chain of reasonably foreseeable events.—Brady v. Some injury anticipated
Railroad could not escape liability for brakeman's loss of leg during switching operation when in course of duty brakeman attempted to uncouple freight cars on ground that injury from protruding spikes to brakeman engaged in switching operation was so improbable that it was not reasonable to anticipate it, since liability is not dependent on prevision of precise event, it being sufficient if some injury may be reasonably expected, unless precaution is taken.—Virginian Ry. administrative rule,[14] and, although the Federal Employers' Liability Act imposes liability for an injury "resulting in whole or in part" from the negligence of a railroad company in failing to maintain its engines or cars in the prescribed condition, it necessarily remains true that the partial negligence must be of the same causal nature as though no other element of negligence were present.[15] However, if the danger or defect in respect of the locomotive was the proximate cause of an employee's injury the railroad may be held responsible for its negligence in such respect,[16] and this is true although other instrumentalities may have concurred with the railroad's negligence in causing the injury.[17]

In an action against a railroad company for injuries to an employee caused by allegedly defective cars, the employer is not liable therefor unless the injuries were proximately caused by the alleged defects.

Defects in railroad cars alleged as a cause of injury will not make the employer liable unless such defects were the proximate cause of the injury complained of,[18] and this rule is applicable even in cases where the defect constitutes a violation of the railroad's statutory duty,[19] such as under the Federal Employer's Liability Act.[20] On the other hand, recovery may be had against the railroad company where the injury was caused, wholly or in part, by a defective car.[21]

Federal Safety Appliance Act. In order to sustain a recovery on the ground that a railway company has violated the Federal Safety Appliance Act in respect of the equipment of its cars, there must be a causal relation between the fact of delinquency and the fact of injury, and the act has not changed the rule of law as to proximate cause, or broken down distinctions between the occasion and the cause of injury,[22] and a violation of such statute gives rise to no cause of action in favor of an injured employee unless it occasions or contributes to the injury.[23] On the other hand, where proximate cause is shown the railroad may be held responsible,[24]

Act of third person

The fact that railroad brakeman, in his natural haste to escape from locomotive engine cab to avoid death or injury from steam, smoke, and embers escaping from boiler, which burst because of engineer's negligence in failing to keep sufficient water therein, knocked fireman from cab, causing his death, did not relieve railroad company from liability therefor on ground that such negligence was not proximate cause of death.—Louisville & N. and failure to comply with the act may be held the proximate cause of injury even though at the time thereof the employee was not engaged in an operation in which the safety appliances were specially designed to afford protection.[25]

Provisions of the act relative to automatic coupling devices are construed as requiring that recovery be limited to injuries proximately caused by a failure of cars to couple automatically or by the fact that they were not capable of being uncoupled without necessity of men going between the ends of the cars,[26] and where the defect in the coupling merely creates a condition under which, or an incidental situation in which, the employee is injured, but where the defective coupling is not in itself an efficient cause of the injury, no recovery may be had.[27] On the other hand, the railroad may be held responsible for its negligence in respect of defective couplings where the employee was injured as a proximate result of such defect,[28] as where at the time of the accident he was engaged in the act of coupling or uncoupling,[29] or was injured an instant before beginning[30] or an instant after completing[31] such act. This does not mean, however, that the injured employee must have been engaged in the act of coupling or uncoupling at the time of the accident,[32] since the act extends its protection to employees other than those engaged in coupling

Injury resulting "in part" from violation

In railroad injury cases the concept of proximate cause has been expanded to include a violation of Safety Appliance Act which contributes to injury or death of an employee or has such causal relation thereto that such injury or death results "in part" from violation.—Bocook v. Crossing track after completing coupling

If switchman who was crushed between couplers was in clear after cars uncoupled and then went back between cars to get on other side of track and not for any purpose connected with uncoupling cars, defective condition of coupler was not proximate cause of his death.—Truesdale v. Wheelock, 74 S.W.2d 585, 335 Mo. 924.

Remaining in danger

Violation of Safety Appliance Act was not proximate cause of death of switchman remaining in dangerous position after completing coupling.—Peters v. Wabash Ry. Co., 42 S.W.2d 588, 328 Mo. 924, certiorari denied 52 S.Ct. 209, 284 U.S. 686, 76 L.Ed. 580.

Inspection trip

Where a freight train parted because of defective couplings, and the conductor made an inspection trip along the stalled train at night to discover the trouble and fell off a bridge and suffered injuries from which he died, the defective coupling created the condition necessitating the trip which ended in the fall but could not be regarded as an efficient or proximate cause of such fall so as to permit recovery for injuries resulting from violation of the safety appliance act provisions relative to couplings.—Reetz v. Chicago & E. R. Co., C.C.A.Ohio, 46 F.2d 50.

Natural and probable consequences

In action for personal injuries sustained in coupling cars, instruction not to allow damages for injuries received as sole result of negligent act of defendant's employees in backing engine into cars for purpose of releasing plaintiff was properly refused, inasmuch as such attempted release was a connected and natural consequence flowing from the defects in coupling and attachment which caused plaintiff's original injuries, and damages could not be diminished because such attempted release aggravated plaintiff's injuries.—Fort Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Williams, Tex.Civ.App., 275 S.W. 415, certiorari denied 46 S.Ct. 356, 270 U.S. 661, 70 L.Ed. 786.

Fall from bridge

Where train broke apart on bridge because of defective coupling, and brakeman, in attempting repairs so that train could proceed, fell from bridge and was injured, defective coupling was proximate cause of injury.—Minneapolis, St. P. & S. On way out

If switchman who was crushed between couplers went between cars because of defective condition of coupler and was on way out when caught between draw bars, foreman's act in giving kick signal without knowing he was there was merely concurring cause and the defective coupler remained the proximate cause of the accident.—Truesdale v. Wheelock, 74 S.W.2d 585, 335 Mo. 924.

Reasonable time to get out

In action for death of switchman crushed between couplers, defective coupler did not cease to operate as proximate cause of his going between cars until he had reasonable time to get out.—Truesdale v. Wheelock, supra.

or uncoupling operations,[33] and defective couplings may constitute the proximate cause of injury irrespective of the character of work or the physical position of the employee at the time of the accident.[34] The defective condition of the coupler need not be the sole cause of injury in order to render the railroad liable.[35]

§ 259. Mines and Excavations

In order to hold a master liable for injuries alleged to have resulted from dangers or defects in mines or other excavations, it is essential to show that his negligence in such respect was the proximate cause of the injury.

In order to hold a master liable for injuries to a servant employed in a mine or other excavation, alleged to have been caused by defects in the place of work or of the machinery and appliances, the defects alleged must be shown to have been the proximate cause of the injuries,[36] even where the defects consist in the master's failure to comply with a statutory requirement.[37]

C. METHODS OF WORK; RULES AND ORDERS

§ 260. Methods of Work in General

In order to protect his servants, a master must provide, or use ordinary care to provide, reasonably safe and suitable methods of work.

At least where the work is complex and the conditions which may arise are uncertain and obscure,[38] a master must provide, or use ordinary care to provide, methods of work reasonably calculated to secure the safety of his employees,[39] even though the

Defectively coupled car leaving tracks

Failure of defendant railroad to have its freight car equipped with a coupler as required by Safety Appliance Act so that it was necessary to pull car by chains attached to locomotive was a proximate cause of conductor's fatal injury, occurring when car left the rails.—Bocook v. Primary and absolute duty

N.C.—Bradford v. English, 130 S.E. 705, 190 N.C. 742.

Where a reasonably safe plan or method is reasonably available and work is essentially of a hazardous nature.[40] The master must see that the machinery and appliances are used and operated in a reasonable or proper manner,[41] in order to enable the employee to do his work as safely as the hazards incident to employment will permit.[42] Failure to use a reasonably safe method constitutes negligence for which the master is liable to the employee,[43] where such a method is practicable and available.[44] If he selects a method of performing the work which enhances its hazards,[45] or fails to adopt a method or plan customarily and usually employed by reasonably prudent persons engaged in similar work,[46] he is liable for a resulting injury.

The use of the best[47] or safest[48] method is not required; nor is the master required to adopt unreasonable or impracticable means or methods,[49] or those which will not be effective, or would be effective only in rare instances.[50] Although the master practicable, it is the duty of master to use reasonable care to see to it not only that such a plan or method is established, but that at all times it is actually maintained and observed.—Federal Compress Co. v. Craig, 7 So.2d 532, 192 Miss. 689.

must properly plan, coördinate, and supervise the work,[51] the law does not require him to oversee and supervise the details of the work,[52] and he is not an insurer of the safety of the manner in which he directs the work to be done.[53]

Employee's use of own judgment. An employer supplying suitable tools and fellow servants is not liable for an injury sustained by an employee using his own judgment as to the method of work;[54] and, where an employee is allowed to exercise his own judgment as to how the work should be done, he may recover against the master only if the injury resulted from some omission or defect on the latter's part, of a kind from which injury might be expected.[55]

Youthful and inexperienced servants. A master may not prescribe methods of work for youthful servants, which, while reasonably safe for adults, would be fraught with unnecessary danger to youthful servants.[56]

§ 261. —— Operation of Railroads

a. In general
b. Duty to employees riding, or seeking to ride, on trains or cars
c. Collisions

a. In General

In order to protect its employees, a railroad company must adopt methods commensurate with the dangers involved. In special circumstances, a high rate of speed may constitute negligence.

While railroad employees are presumed to look out for themselves[57] and must look out for passing trains,[58] railroad companies must adopt such methods and regulations to protect their employees as are commensurate with the dangers involved in the operation of railroads,[59] although, in the absence of
